QUESTION PRESENTED

Whether the Due Process Clause bars the use of “reverse bifurcation” in a consolidated mass-tort trial, whereby a defendant’s liability for punitive damages to hundreds of plaintiffs is adjudicated, based entirely on aggregate proof, prior to any finding of compensatory liability to even a single plaintiff.

RULE 14.1(b) STATEMENT

Petitioners are Philip Morris USA Inc., Brown & Williamson Holdings, Inc., Lorillard Tobacco Company and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company. Respondents are Ronald Accord and all other plaintiffs in the case styled In re: Tobacco Litigation, Civil Action No. 00-C-5000, Ohio County, West Virginia, as well as the Honorable Arthur M. Recht in his capacity as judge/special appointee of the West Virginia Mass Litigation Panel. There are approximately 735 plaintiffs in Civil Action No. 00-C-5000, and no caption in this proceeding identifies those individuals. Petitioners have included as an appendix to this petition an unofficial list of the plaintiffs subject to the challenged trial order who have named one or more of the petitioners as a defendant. See App. 77a-109a.

Twenty other defendants are subject to the challenged trial order, but were not parties to the writ of prohibition proceeding in the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Petitioners also have included as an appendix to this petition an unofficial list of these defendants. See App. 110a-111a.

RULE 29.6 STATEMENT

Petitioner Philip Morris USA Inc. is a wholly owned subsidiary of Altria Group, Inc. Altria Group, Inc. is the only publicly held company that owns 10% or more of Philip Morris USA Inc.'s stock. Altria Group, Inc. is a publicly held company. No publicly held company owns 10% or more of Altria Group, Inc.'s stock.

Petitioner Brown & Williamson Holdings, Inc. is an indirect, wholly owned subsidiary of British American Tobacco, p.l.c., a publicly traded corporation. Before August 2, 2004, Petitioner was known as Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation. On July 30, 2004, a transaction was completed whereby Petitioner R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company became the successor in interest to Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation's U.S. tobacco business.

Petitioner Lorillard Tobacco Company is wholly owned by Lorillard, Inc., which is wholly owned by Loews Corporation. Shares of Loews Corporation are publicly traded. Other subsidiaries of Loews Corporation that are not wholly owned by Loews Corporation but have some securities in the hands of the public are CNA Financial Corporation and Diamond Offshore Drilling, Inc. In addition, Loews Corporation indirectly owns 100% of the general partner of Boardwalk Pipeline Partners, LP, whose subsidiaries, Boardwalk Pipelines, LP and Texas Gas Transmission, L.L.C., have issued bonds that are publicly owned. Loews Corporation has also issued Carolina Group stock, a publicly traded tracking stock.

Petitioner R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, a North Carolina corporation, is the successor by merger to R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, a New Jersey corporation. The existing R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company is an indirect, wholly owned subsidiary of Reynolds American Inc., a publicly traded corporation. Petitioner Brown & Williamson Holdings, Inc. owns approximately 42% of the common stock of Reynolds American Inc. As noted above, Brown & Williamson Holdings, Inc. is an indirect, wholly owned subsidiary of British American Tobacco, p.l.c., a publicly traded corporation.

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI

Petitioners Philip Morris USA Inc., Brown & Williamson Holdings, Inc., Lorillard Tobacco Company, and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company respectfully petition for a writ of certiorari to review the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia in this case.

JUDGMENTS BELOW

The order of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, App. 1a-2a, is unreported. The underlying order of the Circuit Court for Ohio County, App. 3a-4a, is unreported. An earlier decision of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia addressing issues that are the subject of this petition, App. 31a-65a, is reported at 624 S.E.2d 738.

JURISDICTION

The order of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia denying petitioners' petition for a writ of prohibition was entered on November 7, 2007. App. 1a-2a. This Court has jurisdiction to review this decision under 28 U.S.C. § 1257(a). See Bd. of Educ. v. Super. Ct., 448 U.S. 1343, 1345-46 (1980); Madruca v. Super. Ct., 346 U.S. 556, 557 n.1 (1954) ("The State Supreme Court's judgment finally disposing of the writ of prohibition is a final judgment reviewable here under 28 U.S.C. § 1257.").

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION INVOLVED

The Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution provides: "nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law * * *."

STATEMENT

The courts of West Virginia have adopted, and employ with increasing frequency, an unconstitutional approach to the adjudication of punitive-damages claims in mass-tort litigation. In the decisions below, the West Virginia courts have approved a trial plan that consolidates more than 700 separate personal-injury actions brought by individual smokers. The plaintiffs' product liability and fraudulent concealment claims—similar to one another only in that each plaintiff asserts an injury related to his or her use of some tobacco product—will be tried in a three-stage proceeding.

Phase I of this trial is scheduled to commence on March 18, 2008. In that proceeding, the jury will determine, based entirely on aggregate proof that is untethered to the injuries or experiences of any individual plaintiff, certain elements of the compensatory liability inquiry. This jury will also determine—again without the benefit of evidence about any individual plaintiff—whether each defendant's conduct merits punitive damages. If it answers this question in the affirmative as to any defendant, the same jury in Phase I(A) will determine a punitive damages "multiplier" for that defendant. That determination, too, will be based entirely on aggregate proof; the evidence will bear no demonstrated nexus to the injuries to any individual plaintiff, much less to those of all plaintiffs.

In Phase II proceedings, different fact-finders will determine whether each plaintiff has established the remaining elements of his or her liability claims and is entitled to compensatory damages. The Phase I(A) multiplier will then be used to fix the particular dollar amount of punitive damages owed by each defendant to each individual plaintiff.

The Phase I jury will thus be asked to determine whether each defendant's conduct warrants punishment, and to set a single punitive-damages multiplier for each defendant that will be applied in every follow-on case, based on a broad composite of the actions of four different defendants over the course of a half century. It will do so without being told anything at all about the persons who allegedly were harmed by any aspect of that composite, what injuries those persons suffered, or whether the defendants are responsible for those injuries. Nor will the jury know the total amount of compensatory damages the plaintiffs will eventually recover—or whether that sum will be sufficient to accomplish the State's interest in punishment and deterrence. Defense counsel will be wholly unable to defend against plaintiffs' amorphous claim for punitive damages, because individual discovery has been relegated to Phase II: during Phase I, petitioners will not be able to cross-examine individual plaintiffs or present their affirmative defenses. And the Phase II juries will apply the Phase I findings to the cases of all the plaintiffs who can prove their claims for compensatory liability and damages—regardless of whether those individuals were harmed by the conduct that formed the basis of the first jury's imposition of punitive liability and damages.

West Virginia's approach to the determination of punitive liability and punitive damages in mass-tort litigation is foreclosed by this Court's decisions in State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408 (2003) and Philip Morris USA v. Williams, 127 S. Ct. 1057 (2007). In those two cases, this Court held that, because the Due Process Clause abhors the “arbitrary determination” of punitive damages, the proceedings must ensure that a jury has the information necessary to exercise its powerful discretionary authority in a rational way. Williams, 127 S. Ct. at 1062. The trial plan at issue here—which the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals described as a “common” feature of mass-tort litigation in that State—ensures the opposite.

First, the Phase I jury will not know (i) whether the conduct it has heard about actually harmed any plaintiff; (ii) the severity of any injury that resulted; (iii) which defendants—if any—are responsible for that harm; or (iv) the total amount of compensatory damages owed to the plaintiffs by any defendant. Punishment imposed in this manner cannot possibly be grounded in the facts of the actual suit before the court, as due process requires; rather, it will inevitably be based upon “the merits of other parties’ hypothetical claims against a defendant.” State Farm, 538 U.S. at 423; see also Williams, 127 S. Ct. at 1063. The punishment will thus reflect nothing more than the jury’s view that a particular defendant is “an unsavory individual or business” with substantial financial resources—precisely the result that due process forbids. State Farm, 538 U.S. at 422-23. And because the Phase I jury will have no information about the total amount of compensatory damages owed to the plaintiffs by any defendant, it cannot possibly determine whether “the defendant’s culpability, after having paid compensatory damages, is so reprehensible as to warrant the imposition of further sanctions.” State Farm, 538 U.S. at 419 (emphasis added).

Second, the Phase I jury’s findings will subsequently be applied in the trials of all of the plaintiffs. Accordingly, the plaintiffs who were not harmed by the conduct that the Phase I jury found egregious will still see their proven compensatory damages enhanced by a multiplier that is based on the defendant’s conduct toward other parties—a clear violation of this Court’s “explicit” holding in Williams that “a jury may not punish for the harm caused others.” 127 S. Ct. at 1065.

1. On September 28, 1999, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Appeals for West Virginia entered an administrative order consolidating all tobacco-related personal injury suits then pending in West Virginia—more than 120 at that time—and transferring them to the Circuit Court of Ohio County for coordinated proceedings.<sup>1</sup> The court did not hold a class-certification hearing prior to aggregating the suits. Nor were the suits consolidated under W. Va R. Civ. P. 42(a), which would have required a determination that consolidation would “promote judicial economy and convenience of the parties, and avoid prejudice and confusion.” State ex rel. Appalachian Power Co. v. Ranson, 438 S.E.2d 609, 610, Syl. Pt. 2 (W. Va. 1993) (emphasis added).<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The Circuit Court of Ohio County is a trial court. West Virginia has no intermediate appellate courts. A decision of a Circuit Court may be reviewed by West Virginia’s highest court, the Supreme Court of Appeals, on direct appeal. Alternatively, as in this case, a party may petition for a writ of prohibition “to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers.” Crawford v. Taylor, 75 S.E.2d 370, Syl. Pt. 1 (W. Va. 1953); W. Va. Code § 53-1-1.

Rather, these initial 120 claims were consolidated under West Virginia’s special mass-tort procedure, Trial Court Rule 26.01, which allows consolidation on the basis of a showing that there are some “common issues of law or fact” and that consolidation will lead to an “expeditious” resolution of the claims.

More than 1,000 additional plaintiffs soon joined the consolidated proceeding. Their individual suits allege 24 different kinds of injuries, including various types of cancer; cardiovascular and coronary disease; peripheral vascular disease; and chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. Moreover, the complaints propose widely varying theories of liability, including strict liability, negligence, breach of express warranty, fraudulent concealment, and civil conspiracy. Plaintiffs allege that they used more than 200 different tobacco products—including many that were not even cigarettes—beginning at different points in time, and lasting for different durations. Thus, plaintiffs themselves claim that they were affected in dramatically different ways by dramatically different aspects of defendants’ alleged conduct.

2. On January 11, 2000, the trial court issued a case management order. Over petitioners’ objections, the trial court adopted the trial plan proposed by plaintiffs’ counsel. This plan provided that “[a]ll personal injury tobacco cases for plaintiffs now pending, filed in, or transferred to and accepted by this Court * * * shall be included in a single consolidated trial in Ohio County * * *.” App. 69a (Trial Plan ¶ 1). The plan further ordered that a consolidated trial of hundreds of separate claims would be bifurcated into multiple phases. In Phase I—without any consideration of any evidence concerning any actual plaintiff—the jury will first determine “general liability issues,” including whether each defendant could be held liable on a theory of fraudulent concealment, negligence, product defect, or warranty. The Phase I jury will also determine “entitlement to punitive damages” and a multiplier, to be uniformly applicable to all successful plaintiffs regardless of the specifics of their claims. In Phase II, “issues unique to each plaintiff’s” claim for compensatory damages will be tried before different fact-finders. App. 69a-70a (Trial Plan ¶ 3).

As the trial court’s subsequent decisions have confirmed, no individual plaintiff’s claims will be tried in Phase I. Almost no plaintiff-specific discovery has been permitted, and the Phase I jury will not be permitted to hear evidence concerning any particular plaintiff’s case. That jury will not hear evidence or make findings, for example, regarding the reasons why any individual plaintiff began smoking, when and for how long he or she smoked, which defendant’s cigarette brands (or other tobacco products) he or she used, whether any defendant influenced his or her smoking decisions, or what he or she understood about the health risks of smoking. The Trial Plan relegates any plaintiff-specific inquiry to Phase II—after the decision on punishment has already been rendered, and the one-size-fits-all multiplier conclusively established. App. 70a, 74a (Trial Plan ¶¶ 3, 6).

3. After this Court decided State Farm in 2003, petitioners asked the trial court to re-evaluate the constitutionality of the trial plan. The court vacated the plan on June 16, 2004 on the ground that asking the jury to assess punitive damages in Phase I would violate defendants' due process rights. As the court explained:

This Court has read and reread Campbell in an effort to determine whether there is any conceivable manner to salvage the extant Case Management Order and still accommodate the due process demands of Campbell to require any punitive damage award to punish and deter conduct that has a specific relationship to a specific injured party. It cannot be done.

App. 66a.

4. At respondents' request, the trial court subsequently agreed to certify the following question to the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals:

Does the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, as interpreted by State Farm v. Campbell, preclude a bifurcated Trial Plan in a consolidated action consisting of personal injury claims of approximately 1,000 individual smokers, wherein Phase I of the trial would decide certain elements of liability and a punitive damages multiplier and Phase II of the trial would decide for each plaintiff compensatory damages and punitive damages based upon the punitive damages multiplier determined in Phase I?

App. 43a.

West Virginia's high court answered the certified question in the negative, holding that it could find "nothing in [State Farm] that per se precludes a bifurcated trial plan in which a punitive damages multiplier is established prior to the determination of individual compensatory damages.” In re Tobacco Litig., 624 S.E.2d at 741. Reading State Farm as a narrow decision, based on “extreme” facts (id. at 742), the court rejected the trial court’s contrary conclusion that State Farm requires an “analysis of the defendant’s conduct vis-à-vis a specific plaintiff” and thus “requires that the defendant’s conduct be tailored to each plaintiff.” Ibid. In any event, in the Supreme Court of Appeals’ view, post-verdict excessiveness review by the trial court could cure any constitutional error associated with the structure of the proceedings. Id. at 743.

5. On remand, the trial court had this to say about the high court’s interpretation of State Farm: “I still don’t think I was wrong * * * when I got the opinion from the West Virginia Supreme Court, quite frankly, I just went back, and I said they don’t want to really hear it. * * * Now, I’m not saying they have answered the particular conundrum, maybe, that we have. I don’t think that.” 12/14/2006 Hearing Tr. at 27-28. Nevertheless, over petitioners’ objections, the circuit court reinstated the original trial plan. See 4/3/2006 Hearing Tr. at 13-15, 36, 38. Despite the court’s continuing concerns that the trial plan would not pass muster under State Farm, it made clear that it would not attempt to ensure that Phase I would be limited to purported common issues and common evidence. 12/14/2006 Hearing Tr. at 29. As a result, as respondents’ counsel has conceded, “some of the issues that we will try surely will not apply to everyone. *Maybe some of them won’t apply to anyone * * **” 9/18/2007 Hearing Tr. at 33 (emphasis added).

6. On February 20, 2007, this Court issued its decision in Philip Morris USA v. Williams. Petitioners again moved to vacate the trial plan, arguing that Williams—which held “explicitly that a jury may not punish for the harm caused others” and affirmatively requires States to “protect against [the] risk” that juries will seek to punish the defendant for having caused “harm to others,” 127 S. Ct. at 1063, 1065—made the unconstitutionality of West Virginia’s trial plan even more plain than had State Farm. The trial court denied petitioners’ motion on May 23, 2007, App. 24a, and, on August 17, 2007, reaffirmed its decision to go forward with the bifurcated trial plan, App. 12a-14a.

7. Petitioners then filed a petition for a writ of prohibition in the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, seeking to bar the trial court from “having one jury determine a single uniform punishment (a punitive damages multiplier) for all Plaintiffs first, and having other juries determine liability, defenses, and compensatory damages for individual plaintiffs later.” Writ Petition at 1. Citing State Farm and Williams, petitioners explained that this trial plan would violate their due process rights by allowing the jury to impose punishment before petitioners’ liability to any claimant had been established and the extent of the compensatory damages fixed. Additionally, petitioners argued that under Williams, a single punitive damages multiplier could not be applied to every case because plaintiffs claim to have been injured in different ways and by different aspects of the defendants’ conduct. As petitioners explained:

evidence in support of claims of concealment or failure to warn of the risks of smoking cannot be the basis of punitive damages for those Plaintiffs aware either of the risks of smoking or of the facts supposedly concealed. Evidence of the so-called “Frank Statement” [an advertisement published in 1954] * * * cannot be the basis of punitive damages for Plaintiffs who never saw it—indeed, were not even born or could not yet read when the advertisement was published.<sup>3</sup> Evidence of other cigarette advertisements cannot be the basis of punitive damages for Plaintiffs who never saw or heeded them. * * * The list goes on and on.

Writ petition at 12-13 (footnotes omitted).

Given the disparate nature of the plaintiffs’ claims, and the aggregated evidence that will be admitted in Phase I, petitioners also argued that there would be no way to ensure that the Phase I jury’s findings would bear the constitutionally-mandated nexus to the harm done to each plaintiff who would receive punitive damages based on those findings. The West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals denied the petition without comment in an order dated November 7, 2007, over the dissent of one justice of the court. App. 1a-2a.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE PETITION

West Virginia’s approach to adjudicating mass-tort cases is deeply and fundamentally flawed.

<sup>3</sup> The “Frank Statement” was a “full-page advertisement signed by the four defendant cigarette manufacturers that was published in the 448 American newspapers serving cities with populations of more than 25,000 people.” Insolia v. Philip Morris Inc., 216 F.3d 596, 602 (7th Cir. 2000).

Driven by the apparent desire to clear the state's dockets of pending claims, West Virginia's high court has adopted a "system of mass tort litigation" (see In re Tobacco Litig., 624 S.E.2d 738, 741 (W. Va. 2005)) that is patently unconstitutional. Under this "system," disparate claims are consolidated and then tried in a reverse-bifurcated structure that requires the jury to assess punishment before the defendant's liability to any plaintiff has been established. This approach to the adjudication of mass-tort cases cannot be reconciled with this Court's punitive-damages jurisprudence, both because it requires the jury to impose punishment without the information it would need to exercise its discretion in a rational way, and because due process does not permit the application of a one-size-fits-all multiplier to plaintiffs who claim to have been injured in various ways, to varying extents, and by varying conduct. It is also at odds with the decisions of other courts. Despite the clear constitutional infirmities of this model, West Virginia employs it with increasing frequency. And because most of the defendants subjected to it are quickly forced to settle, opportunities for this Court to intervene are—and will continue to be—rare. This Court should grant certiorari now to bring West Virginia's mass-tort litigation system into compliance with constitutional standards.

I. WEST VIRGINIA'S APPROACH TO ASSESSING PUNITIVE DAMAGES VIOLATES DUE PROCESS.

A. West Virginia's Approach Cannot Be Reconciled With State Farm And Williams.

West Virginia's approach to assessing punitive damages in mass-tort cases is incompatible with this Court's punitive damages decisions, particularly State Farm and Williams. Those decisions have emphasized that (i) punishment must be narrowly focused on the defendant's conduct toward the plaintiff, Williams, 127 S. Ct. at 1065; State Farm, 538 U.S. at 423; (ii) punishment may be imposed only after a defendant has had a full "opportunity to defend against the charge," Williams, 127 S. Ct. at 1063; and (iii) punishment should be imposed only when the plaintiff's proven compensatory damages are insufficient to serve the state's objectives of deterrence and punishment. State Farm, 538 U.S. at 419.

A trial court has an affirmative obligation to protect against "an unreasonable and unnecessary risk" that a defendant will be punished for harms to parties other than the plaintiff, or for conduct other than that which harmed the plaintiff. Williams, 127 S. Ct. at 1065; see also State Farm, 538 U.S. at 422-23. The trial plan here does not merely fail to protect against such a risk—it guarantees that it will materialize.

1. The Phase I Jury's Findings Will Not Bear A Sufficient Nexus To The Conduct That Harmed Any Particular Plaintiff.

1. The question before the jury in Phase I will be whether each defendant engaged in conduct that warrants an award of punitive damages—which, under West Virginia law, means a "wrongful act" that was undertaken "maliciously, wantonly, mischievously or with criminal indifference to civil obligations." Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp. v. D.C. Wrecker Serv., 647 S.E.2d 861, 867 (W. Va. 2007). In State Farm, this Court made clear that any such finding must rest on the conduct that harmed the plaintiff before the court.

A defendant's dissimilar acts, independent from the acts upon which liability was premised, may not serve as the basis for punitive damages. A defendant should be punished for the conduct that harmed the plaintiff, not for being an unsavory individual or business. * * * The reprehensibility guidepost does not permit courts to expand the scope of the case so that a defendant may be punished for any malfeasance, which in this case extended for a 20-year period.

538 U.S. at 422-24 (emphasis added). See also id. at 422 (to be relevant to the punitive damages inquiry, defendant's "conduct must have a nexus to the specific harm suffered by the plaintiff").

In this case, it will be impossible for the Phase I jury to evaluate each defendant's conduct toward the plaintiff before the court—because that jury will know nothing about any of the plaintiffs in this consolidated action. The trial court has made clear that the Phase I jury will not be given any information about even a single plaintiff. The Phase I jury will thus be left to hear only a generalized, aggregated presentation about petitioners' conduct over half a century.

The suits consolidated in this case present a pastiche of widely varying claims brought by a broad array of West Virginia smokers. Some respondents started smoking before World War II, many others in the 1950s and 1960s, and others as late as the 1980s. Some smoked only "regular" cigarettes, while others smoked only "light" cigarettes; and others still smoked both. Some claim to have started smoking while young, others only after they reached adulthood. Some plaintiffs claim that they were addicted to cigarettes, and others deny that they were unable to stop. Some plaintiffs claim that smoking caused them to develop cancer; others claim that it caused them to develop tooth decay. And the list goes on. Because of these disparities, plaintiffs assert—and the trial court has agreed—that they must present evidence covering a half-century of defendants’ conduct in order to address the facts that are alleged to have injured each of the hundreds of plaintiffs before the court. But as respondents also belatedly concede, “some of the issues that we will try surely will not apply to everyone. *Maybe some of them won’t apply to anyone * * **.” Sept. 18, 2007 Hearing Tr. at 33 (emphasis added).

Thus, any finding that one or more of petitioners engaged in conduct giving rise to liability for punitive damages will necessarily rest on a retrospective view of petitioners’ conduct over a fifty-year period, not on the conduct that harmed any individual. This procedure clearly raises a risk that the court will ultimately “award[] punitive damages to punish and deter conduct that bore no relation to the [plaintiffs’] harm,” State Farm, 538 U.S. at 422, because neither the defendants nor court nor the jury will have any way of identifying the “acts upon which liability is premised.” Id. at 422. It is difficult to imagine a trial plan that would more effectively guarantee that any verdict in plaintiffs’ favor will reflect nothing more than the jury’s view that a particular defendant is “an unsavory individual or business.” Id. at 423. This is precisely what the Due Process Clause forbids.

The trial plan also precludes petitioners from defending themselves against plaintiffs’ punitive damages claims. As in many West Virginia mass-tort cases, the trial plan bars “[d]iscovery relevant to Phase II issues” until “after [the Phase I] consolidated trial of the common issues.” App. 74a (Trial Plan ¶6) (emphasis added). Nor will defendants be able to cross-examine any individual plaintiffs or raise any affirmative defenses during Phase I. Thus, neither defendants nor the Phase I jury will have any idea, for example, how many of the plaintiffs “knew that smoking was dangerous or did not rely upon the defendant’s statements to the contrary.” Williams, 127 S. Ct. at 1063. This curtailment of defendants’ opportunity to oppose plaintiffs’ claims is a due process violation in and of itself. Ibid. (“the Due Process Clause prohibits a State from punishing an individual without first providing that individual with ‘an opportunity to present every available defense.’”) (emphasis added).

2. The jury’s determination of a punitive-damages multiplier in Phase I(A) will, like the Phase I verdict, rest on an evidentiary showing that will be at once overbroad and incomplete. The jury necessarily will be speculating about the number of victims that were actually harmed by each defendant; the extent of their injuries; the extent to which those injuries were actually caused by the defendant’s alleged wrongful conduct (as opposed to the risks inherent in smoking cigarettes); and the nature of the particular wrongful conduct that harmed each plaintiff. All of those factors are key to a proper assessment of the relative reprehensibility of a defendant’s conduct—“the most important indicium of the reasonableness of a punitive damages award.” BMW of N. Am. Inc., v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 575 (U.S. 1996). As this Court explained in State Farm, “[d]ue process does not permit courts, in the calculation of punitive damages, to adjudicate the merits of other parties’ hypothetical claims against a defendant under the guise of the reprehensibility analysis * * *.” 538 U.S. at 423. Here, the jurors will be considering solely “the merits of other parties’ hypothetical claims,” because they will know nothing at all about the claims of the actual plaintiffs.

In State Farm, moreover, this Court explained that where the defendant’s compensatory liability is large, the imposition of any award of punitive damages may be unwarranted and unconstitutional. “It should be presumed that a plaintiff has been made whole for his injuries by compensatory damages, so punitive damages should only be awarded if the defendant’s culpability * * * is so reprehensible as to warrant the imposition of further sanctions to achieve punishment or deterrence.” 538 U.S. at 419. The Phase I jury, of course, will have no way to know, or even guess, the amount of compensatory damages that will ultimately be paid to the plaintiffs. Accordingly, it will be impossible for that jury to determine whether, and to what extent, additional sanctions are necessary or appropriate. Cf. White v. Ford Motor Co., 500 F.3d 963, 974 (9th Cir. 2007) (holding that Nevada law required a jury hearing a punitive-damages retrial to be told the amount of compensatory damages that the first jury had awarded: “Without knowing the amount of those damages, the punitive damages jury could not have come to a reasoned conclusion as to the amount of additional damages necessary to deter Ford from similar conduct in the future.”).

2. The Application Of A Uniform Multiplier To Disparately-Situated Plaintiffs Violates Due Process.

This Court's decisions do not countenance the application of a one-size-fits-all multiplier to plaintiffs allegedly harmed by different aspects of petitioners' past conduct. Williams, 127 S. Ct. at 1065 (holding "explicitly that a jury may not punish for the harm caused others"); State Farm, 538 U.S. at 425 ("[t]he precise [punitive] award in any case, of course, must be based upon the facts and circumstances of the defendant's conduct and the harm to the plaintiff"). In this case, the vast disparities among respondents' claims will make it impossible to ensure in each Phase II trial that the relevant defendant is being punished because, and to the extent that, the Phase I jury found the defendant's conduct toward this particular plaintiff to be reprehensible.

For example, imagine that the jury found that petitioners' allegedly misleading statements to the public about the health effects of "light" cigarettes merited the imposition of punishment and a particular punitive damages multiplier. The across-the-board application of that multiplier would result in the imposition of punitive damages on behalf of respondents who never smoked "light" cigarettes—the vast majority of them—and therefore could not have been harmed by that conduct. The same would be true if the multiplier were based in part on the petitioners' use of particular advertisements: under Williams, that conduct could not lawfully be the basis for awarding punitive damages to respondents who never viewed those ads. Likewise, evidence of alleged marketing to youth cannot lawfully form the basis for awards of punitive damages to plaintiffs who started smoking as adults.

Imposing a rigid multiplier before compensatory damages are ascertained also violates due process by ignoring that the constitutionally permissible relationship between punitive and compensatory damages varies with the actual size of the compensatory award. This Court has held that, in most cases, the maximum allowable penalty will run from zero to nine times the amount of compensatory damages. State Farm, 538 U.S. at 423-25. Because compensatory damages serve a deterrent purpose, the size of the compensatory award is (along with the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct toward the plaintiff) a key factor in gauging the maximum constitutionally permissible ratio of punitive to compensatory damages: in most cases, the maximum ratio will be inversely proportional to the size of the compensatory award. Indeed, "[w]hen compensatory damages are substantial, then a lesser ratio, perhaps only equal to compensatory damages, can reach the outermost limit of the due process guarantee." Id. at 425. In contrast, more extreme punitive damages multiples are reserved for cases in which "a particularly egregious act has resulted in only a small amount of economic damages." Ibid. (quoting BMW, 517 U.S. at 582). Here, however, the ratio will be determined in advance, without any knowledge of the size of the compensatory damages.

Thus, when a uniform punitive damages multiplier is determined before a finding of compensatory damages, it guarantees an unconstitutional result. That procedure deprives the jury and the reviewing court of the ability to make the contextual, individualized decision about the size of a punitive damages award that due process requires. See, e.g., Philip Morris Inc. v. Angeletti, 752 A.2d 200, 249 (Md. 2000) (“Mere widespread, identical proportionality between actual damages and punitive damages for such a multitude of plaintiffs would not necessarily encapsulate the relation between the two types of damages deemed requisite under this State’s common law,” which applies functionally the same analysis as federal constitutional law).

B. The Decision Below Conflicts With Rulings Of The Second Circuit And Other Courts.

The decisions in this case directly conflict with the Second Circuit’s decision in In re Simon II Litigation, 407 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2005). In that case, the court of appeals rejected a trial plan that called for the litigation of punitive liability and punitive damages prior to any determination of compensatory liability or compensatory damages to individual plaintiffs. The court observed that under State Farm, “punishment on any basis that does not have a nexus to the specific harm suffered by the plaintiff” is unconstitutional. Id. at 139. The district court’s trial plan, under which the jury would have estimated total harm to the class and then imposed an aggregate award of punitive damages, raised the risk of such punishment because it failed to account for the differences among plaintiffs. Id. at 138.

The Fifth Circuit, too—even before State Farm—held that, in a case like this one, punitive damages cannot be litigated prior to a determination of compensatory liability and damages. Because consideration of “punitive damages requires individualized proof and determinations,” “punitive damages must be determined after proof of liability to individual plaintiffs at the second stage of a [Title VII] pattern or practice case, not upon the mere finding of general liability to the class at the first stage.” Allison v. Citgo Petroleum Corp., 151 F.3d 402, 418 (5th Cir. 1998). See also Colindres v. QuietFlex Mfg., 235 F.R.D. 347, 377 (S.D. Tex. 2006) (“[P]unitive damages cannot be assessed without proof of liability to individual class members.”) (citing Allison).

Similarly, the Court of Appeals of Maryland firmly rejected a trial plan similar to that at issue here—albeit on state law grounds. Maryland’s high court explained that the plan would not enable the jury to properly assess the amount of punitive damages that are appropriate in specific relation to differing amounts of—and reasons for—actual damages. * * * Under the Circuit Court’s decision * * * the punitive damages determination would be made before any finding of liability to any class member, in the absence of any evidence that defendants’ conduct actually caused any class member’s alleged injury, and without any knowledge of how much, if any, compensatory damages would be awarded to any class member by other juries who would never hear the Phase I evidence.

Angeletti, 752 A.2d 200 at 249 (internal quotation marks omitted). See also id. at 245 (noting that the trial plan called for a punitive-damages multiplier to be used).

The Florida Supreme Court also recently concluded that a punitive damages phase cannot be conducted prior to the resolution of questions pertaining to the defendant's liability to the plaintiff. It therefore vacated a massive punitive damages award erroneously imposed by a Phase I jury. See Engle v. Liggett Group, Inc., 945 So. 2d 1246 (Fla. 2006) (per curiam), cert. denied, 128 S. Ct. 96 (2007). Though petitioners firmly believe that aspects of the Engle decision were fundamentally erroneous, the Florida Supreme Court clearly and correctly rejected the view that a class-wide punitive damages phase may be conducted before the defendant's compensatory liability to any plaintiff has been established. The Florida high court found that this trial plan violated both state law and principles of federal due process, writing that "[i]t was error for the trial court to allow the jury to consider entitlement to punitive damages before the jury found that the plaintiffs had established causation and reliance." 945 So. 2d at 1263. Moreover, "without having total compensatory damages determined it would be impossible to determine whether punitive damages bear a 'reasonable' relationship to the actual harm inflicted on the plaintiff." Id. at 1265 (internal quotation marks omitted).

Several federal district courts have likewise held, especially post-State Farm, that an assessment of punitive damages must be tailored to each individual plaintiff's injury, and thus cannot precede a determination of compensatory liability and damages. In In re Baycol Products Litigation, 218 F.R.D. 197 (D. Minn. 2003), a mass-tort case against a pharmaceutical company, the district court rejected a class action trial plan that was, in relevant respects, functionally identical to the plan approved below, holding that such a structure would violate due process:

To succeed on a punitive damages claim, a plaintiff must prove that the defendant's conduct toward him/her rises to the level required by law. * * * [A] determination of punitive damages is based on individual issues. * * * Plaintiffs' proposed class trial on punitive damages poses * * * due process concerns because the conduct upon which Plaintiffs would base their punitive damages claim is not specific to a particular plaintiff[']s claim."

Id. at 215.<sup>4</sup>

West Virginia's "common" and unconstitutional approach to the litigation of punitive damages claims in mass-tort cases is in conflict with the decisions of this Court and with the rulings of other courts. This Court's immediate review is warranted.

<sup>4</sup> Accord Nelson v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 245 F.R.D. 358, 378 (E.D. Ark. 2007) (punitive damages could not be determined on a classwide basis prior to individualized assessments of harm and compensatory damages: "Individualized determinations are necessary to fully realize the extent of the harm caused by Wal-Mart's conduct and properly assess the need for punishment and deterrence"); O'Neal v. Wackenhut Servs., Inc., No. 3:03-CV-397, 2006 WL 1469348 at *22 (E.D. Tenn. May 25, 2006) (pursuant to State Farm, "a determination of punitive damages would require each plaintiff to demonstrate how the discrimination affected him or her individually. As defendant points out, proof of damages must be related to the harm to the plaintiff. To hold otherwise would violate defendant's rights to due process and would improperly eliminate the jury's discretion to assess punitive damages under the Seventh Amendment").

II. THIS COURT SHOULD GRANT REVIEW IN ORDER TO HALT WEST VIRGINIA’S REPEATED AND UNCONSTITUTIONAL USE OF REVERSE BIFURCATION TO RESOLVE AGGREGATED PUNITIVE-DAMAGES CLAIMS IN MASS-TORT LITIGATION.

A. The West Virginia Supreme Court Of Appeals Has Made Clear That It Will Continue To Place Expediency Over Concerns Of Due Process In Mass-Tort Litigation.

West Virginia’s use of its upside-down procedure in this case is no one-time event. On the contrary, as the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals itself has explained, “bifurcated trial plans structured like the one at issue [in this case] are common in West Virginia.” In re Tobacco Litig., 624 S.E.2d at 742 (emphasis added). The reported cases confirm that in recent years, the West Virginia courts have turned to the aggregation and front-loading of punitive-damages claims as a means of streamlining mass-tort litigation.<sup>5</sup> This approach to assessing punitive

This Court should grant certiorari in order to make express what already should be clear from its decisions in State Farm and Williams—the “common” trial procedure employed in this case does not comport with the requirements of the Due Process Clause. West Virginia has stated quite clearly that it will not amend its “existing system of mass tort litigation” until it receives a “clear indication” from this Court that it must. In re Tobacco Litig., 624 S.E.2d at 741-42. And the decisions below demonstrate that its courts do not view the facial incompatibility of its current procedures with the teachings of this Court in State Farm and Williams as sufficient for that purpose.

In fact, members of West Virginia’s high court appear inclined to work around, restate, or simply ignore this Court’s ruling in State Farm: “As the plied everywhere in the United States, including in West Virginia.”).

It is not a stretch to suggest that in managing mass-tort cases the West Virginia courts have privileged “flexibility” (see State ex rel. Mobil Corp. v. Gaughan, 563 S.E.2d 419, 424 (W. Va.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 944 (2002)) above due process. In the words of one justice of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals, “what process is due is entirely dependent upon the trial judge’s discretion.” In re Tobacco Litig., 624 S.E.2d at 744 (Starcher, J., concurring) (emphasis added). This view that the Due Process Clause places no meaningful limitations on how courts may conduct mass-tort litigation proceedings is totally at odds with settled constitutional principles. As many other courts have recognized, the requirements of the Due Process Clause cannot be set aside simply because plaintiffs have filed numerous cases in one jurisdiction. On the contrary, it is precisely these “considerations of convenience and economy [which] must yield to a paramount concern for a fair and impartial trial.” In re Repetitive Stress Injury Litig., 11 F.3d 368, 373 (2d Cir. 1993) (quoting Johnson v. Celotex Corp., 899 F.2d 1281, 1285 (2d Cir. 1990)).

Accordingly, courts outside West Virginia have recognized that “[t]he systematic urge to aggregate litigation must not be allowed to trump our dedication to individual justice, and we must take care that each individual plaintiff’s—and defendant’s—cause not be lost in the shadow of a towering mass litigation.” In re Brooklyn Navy Yard Asbestos Litig., 971 F.2d 831, 853 (2d Cir. 1992). See also In re Ethyl Corp., 975 S.W.2d 606, 613 (Tex. 1998) (quoting same); Cain v. Armstrong World Indus., 785 F. Supp.

1448, 1456-57 (S.D. Ala. 1992) (“The congestion these [asbestos] cases caused in this district for all civil litigants gives one a skewed view of how to resolve the problem. The ‘Try-as-many-as-you-can-at-one-time’ approach is great if they all, or most, settle; but when they don’t, and they didn’t here, [plaintiffs get] a chance to do something not many other civil litigants can do—overwhelm a jury with evidence.”).

Indeed, here, as in many other mass-tort cases, West Virginia’s courts have aggregated hundreds of disparate cases without attempting to satisfy the standards for certification of a class action. Among those standards is the requirement that common issues must predominate over individual ones. W. Va. R. Civ. P. 23(b). The West Virginia courts have also exempted mass-tort cases from even the typical claims consolidation analysis under W. Va. R. Civ. P. 42(a), which requires (inter alia) a showing that considerations of judicial economy outweigh the potential prejudice and confusion.<sup>8</sup>

Instead, the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals may order mass-tort cases consolidated pursuant to W. Va. Tr. Ct. R. 26.01, under which the consolidation inquiry is exempt from “case law * * * address[ing] issues of joinder, class action, and consolidation.” State ex rel. Allman v. MacQueen, 551 S.E.2d 369, 374 (W. Va. 2001) (per curiam). Rule 26.01 consolidation is governed by no standard inquiry at all; its express purpose is to “permit[] the use of innovative means of trial management concerning issues unique to mass litigation, which would in turn encourage a more expeditious resolution of these matters than that permitted by traditional means of case resolution.” Ibid. The Chief Justice of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals invoked that rule here.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>8</sup> Smoking-and-health claims cannot be consolidated under Fed. R. Civ. P. 42(a). See, e.g., Clinton v. Brown & Williamson Holdings, Inc., Nos. 05 Cv. 9907, 05 Cv. 9908, 05 Cv. 9174 (CB), 2007 WL 2161778 (S.D.N.Y. July 25, 2007) (remaining “common questions of law and fact do not overcome the risk of jury confusion and possible prejudice to the separate defendants if the Court were to consolidate this action for trial purposes.”).

Soon after the high court issued its order consolidating the cases, the number of claims ballooned from roughly 120 to over 1,200, many of which have subsequently been dismissed because the plaintiffs failed to meet the court’s basic procedural requirements. Presumably, the number of cases remains grossly inflated, because many additional claims suffer from various irremediable flaws that will be discovered only after Phase I is over. Accordingly, one of the few tangible facts the jury will be told about the plaintiffs—the number of claimants—will be misleading.

In sum, petitioners now face a premature, aggregated punitive damages proceeding in a case involving disparate claims, injuries and facts—a case that therefore never could have been certified as a class action.<sup>10</sup> The Due Process Clause and this Court’s precedents demand more. This Court should grant review in order to make clear that West Virginia must revise its mass-tort litigation system to comport with due process. See, e.g., Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116, 123 (1999) (certiorari granted because state court’s decision “represented a significant departure from [the United States Supreme Court’s] Confrontation Clause jurisprudence”).

<sup>9</sup> The trial court subsequently denied petitioners’ request for a hearing to determine whether the pending cases presented common issues of law or fact.

<sup>10</sup> For these reasons, courts around the country have refused to grant class certification in smoking-and-health related cases. See, e.g., Engle v. Liggett Group, Inc., 945 So. 2d 1246, 1267 n.9 (Fla. 2006) (collecting cases).

B. Immediate Review Is Warranted.

Certiorari is warranted because the trial plan approved by the West Virginia courts cannot be reconciled with this Court’s decisions in State Farm and Williams, see S. Ct. R. 10(c). And this Court plainly has jurisdiction to review the lower court’s denial of petitioners’ request for a writ of prohibition. See Bd. of Educ., 448 U.S. at 1345-46; Madruga, 346 U.S. at 557 n.1. Moreover, the circumstances of this case demonstrate that the optimal time for review is now. The constitutional violation is complete: the trial that is set to begin on March 18, 2008 will be irreparably flawed from the outset. The deficiencies in the trial plan go to the very heart of the Phase I jury’s decision-making: that jury will be deprived of the most fundamental information that should form the basis for its verdict. Accordingly, there is no way to salvage its findings. Unless this Court acts, those findings will be carried forward into hundreds of Phase II trials, conducted before different finders of fact in numerous West Virginia courtrooms. See App. 70a (Trial Plan ¶3(b)) (in Phase II, “[e]ither separate individual juries, judge or judges will independently address issues unique to each plaintiff’s compensatory damages and any other individual issues in reasonably sized trial groups or on an individual basis”).

Because of the flaws in this trial plan, there is no possible way in which any punitive damages judgment obtained by any plaintiff in this case could be consistent with due process. Accordingly, although this Court in theory could postpone its consideration of this due process question while hundreds of separate Phase II proceedings wend their way through the courts, that course of action would entail years of unnecessary delay and expense for the parties to this case and the West Virginia courts. It would be provident for this Court instead to exercise its jurisdiction over the decision denying petitioners' request for a Writ of Prohibition now. E.g., United States v. Centennial Sav. Bank FSB, 499 U.S. 573, 578 n.3 (1991) (certiorari granted "in light of the significant number of pending cases" affected).

Immediate review is also warranted because the damage done in Phase I—the jury's assessment of a punitive damages award by an unconstitutional procedure—cannot be undone through post-verdict or appellate review. Post-trial remedies like remittitur allow a court only to reduce excessive damages to the maximum amount permissible under the Constitution. See, e.g., Cont'l Trend Res., Inc. v. OXY USA Inc., 101 F.3d 634, 643 (10th Cir. 1996). But remittitur cannot cure a fundamentally-flawed trial plan like this one. The reason is simple: a jury that heard only relevant and admissible evidence that bore a nexus to the injuries of the plaintiffs before the court, that had the opportunity to consider defendants' affirmative defenses, and that knew the total amount of compensatory damages that will ultimately be recovered in this litigation, might well award far less than the maximum punishment allowed by the Constitution.<sup>11</sup> See Merrick v. Paul Revere Life Ins. Co.,

<sup>11</sup> Indeed, this Court has reached this conclusion in the context of criminal sentencing. See Hicks v. Oklahoma, 447 U.S. 343,

500 F.3d 1007, 1018 (9th Cir. 2007) (remittitur can remedy excessiveness, but it is inappropriate “where the constitutional error stems from misguidance regarding the way the jury may use evidence in setting an amount”); White, 500 F.3d at 972-73 (concluding that a new trial on punitive damages, rather than remittitur, is the “proper remedy” for a due process violation); Ramirez v. New York City Off-Track Betting Corp., 112 F.3d 38, 40 (2d Cir. 1997) (“If * * * the record establishes that the jury’s verdict on damages was not only excessive but was also infected by fundamental error, remittitur is improper. In such a case, the judgment of the district court should be vacated and the cause remanded for a new trial on damages.”) (citation omitted). Given the insufficiency of the remittitur remedy in these circumstances, the practical difficulties that would be created if this Court were to postpone consideration of this case and only later declare West Virginia’s trial plan unconstitutional would be enormous.

Finally, immediate review is warranted in light of the well-recognized fact that the extreme settlement pressures presented in mass-tort cases of this kind mean that very few such cases are ever tried to a jury verdict. See, e.g., In re Chevron USA, Inc., 109 F.3d 1016, 1022 (5th Cir. 1997) (Jones, J., specially concurring) (noting that a trial court’s case management decisions in mass-tort cases are not often “effectively reviewable after trial” because defendants

346 (1980) (where State amended its habitual offender statute, defendant sentenced under old statute was entitled to new trial on the appropriate sentence: “Oklahoma denied the petitioner the jury sentence to which he was entitled under state law, simply on the frail conjecture that a jury might have imposed a sentence equally as harsh as” the one it imposed under the invalid statute).

face “enormous” settlement pressures even when the odds of an adverse verdict are slim); Petition for Writ of Certiorari at 28, Mobil Corp. v. Adkins, No. 02-132, 2002 WL 32134868 (U.S. July 24, 2002) (“Given the enormous potential liability that mass aggregations pose for defendants, combined with scrutiny from financial markets, aggregated proceedings exert powerful pressure on defendants to settle even meritless cases.”). This case thus presents this Court with a rare opportunity to consider the question whether a court may determine a defendant’s liability for punitive damages before determining whether the defendant is legally responsible for any plaintiff’s injuries or to pay compensatory damages to any plaintiff. The Court should take hold of this chance to provide much-needed guidance to the lower courts.

CONCLUSION

The petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted.

Respectfully submitted.

West Virginia (November 7, 2007)]

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA

At a Regular Term of the Supreme Court of Appeals continued and held at Charleston, Kanawha County, on the 7th of November, 2007, the following order was made and entered:

State of West Virginia ex rel. Philip Morris USA, Inc.; Brown & Williamson Holdings, Inc.; Lorillard Tobacco Company; and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Petitioners,

Vs.)

No. 072903

Honorable Arthur M. Recht, Judge of the Circuit Court of Ohio County, Chief of the Mass Litigation Panel and All Plaintiffs in In Re: 5000 Consolidated Matter, Respondents.

On a former day, to-wit, September 27, 2007, came the petitioners, Philip Morris USA, Inc., by David B. Thomas, Pamela L. Campbell and Teresa K. Thompson, Allen Guthrie McHugh & Thomas, PLLC, its attorney; Brown & Williamson Holdings, Inc. and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, by W. Henry Jernigan, Jr. and Brace R. Mullett, Dinsmore & Shohl, LLP, their attorneys; and Lorillard Tobacco Company, by Michael J. Farrell and Joseph M. Farrell, Jr., Farrell & Farrell, L.C., its attorneys, and presented to the Court their petition praying for a writ of prohibition to be directed against the respondent, Honorable Arthur M. Recht, Judge of the Circuit Court of Ohio County, Chief of the Mass Litigation Panel, as therein set forth.

Thereafter, on the 24th day of October, 2007, pursuant to a request for a response under Rule 14(b) of the Rules of Appellate Procedure, came the respondent plaintiffs, by Cindy J. Kiblinger, James F. Humphreys & Associates, and Timothy N. Barber, their attorneys, and presented to the Court their initial response thereto.

Upon consideration whereof, the Court is of the opinion that a rule should not issue. It is hereby ordered that the petition for writ of prohibition prayed for by the petitioners is hereby refused. Justice Benjamin would grant.

A True Copy.

Civil Action No. 00-C-5000

(Judge Arthur M. Recht)

ORDER

By agreement, a telephonic hearing was held August 17, 2007 on the issues raised in Defendants' Motion for an Order Setting Forth Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law for the Purpose of Seeking an Extraordinary Writ from the Supreme Court of Appeals.

Upon the submissions and argument thereon, the court announced a denial of the motion and assigned as grounds therefor that the previous holdings on such issues provide an adequate articulation of necessary findings which include:

(1) The hearing held herein on December 14, 2006 and the resultant order entered December 26, 2006.

(2) The hearing held herein on May 23, 2007 and attendant order with attachment. Accordingly, it is hereby ORDERED:

(1) Defendants' Motion for an Order Setting Forth Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law for the Purpose of Seeking an Extraordinary Writ from the Supreme Court of Appeals is denied.

(2) A copy of the transcript of the hearing held August 17, 2007 shall be filed by plaintiffs' counsel upon its receipt and shall be a part of this order as a reflection of the court's holding.

Defendants' objections and exceptions are preserved.

Entered this 28th day of August, 2007.

PROCEEDINGS

THE COURT: We're on the record now, and then, one more time, if we can, first for the plaintiffs, why don't you just state your full name. I will say that, when you speak, if you can just identify yourself each time you speak, that way we can have you down on the record. All right?

MR. BARBER: For the plaintiffs, it's Timothy N. Barber and Cindy Jo Kiblinger and Kenneth McClain for the plaintiffs.

THE COURT: All right. Okay, got that.

MR. GADDES: It's Andrew Gaddes and Bruce Clark and Pamela Campbell for Philip Morris.

MR. FURR: We have Jeff Furr, Tom Schroeder, and Henry Jernigan for Brown & Williamson and R.J. Reynolds.

MR. MUSGRAVE: John Musgrave for Lorillard, and Mr. Farrell, local counsel.

THE COURT: All right. Joseph Farrell, right?

MR. FARRELL: Yes, Your Honor.

MR. TROY: Mark Troy for the Liggett defendants.

THE COURT: Right. Anybody else? Good. All right.

Let me just address one matter rather quickly. I don't know if the plaintiffs received the letter dated August 16th from Pam in which she enclosed an order which modified the case-management plan. It's Revision No. 24, and it has, basically—it structures where we're going from here on.

Did the plaintiffs receive that?

MR. McCLAIN: Yes, and I think we responded.

THE COURT: Is there any objection to the order?

MR. McCLAIN: Yes, we had some suggested change in dates as I understand it. I've been out, Judge, but didn't we have some changes in the dates that we were asking for?

MR. BARBER: In addition to the structural things, we have some other objections, Judge. As an example—this is an example now—of requesting us to send everything FedEx and fax for everything to everybody, and the filing times of 3:30 p.m.

But that's just an example of the—we just want to reserve rather than have you precipitously enter an order changing the thing, we want to have you be able to review our objections to it. And then whatever you want to do is fine, but we do have some objections to it, substantive objections.

THE COURT: And you say you have sent that to me?

MR. BARBER: No.

THE COURT: You're going to?

MR. BARBER: We just got the thing.

THE COURT: All right, all right; so you'll have it in next week?

MR. BARBER: Next week, certainly by sometime next week. Whatever time you tell us we have to have it, we'll have it in there.

THE COURT: Have it in by Friday if you can, please.

MR. BARBER: Okay. That will be fine, Judge. Thank you.

THE COURT: All right. That's one thing. And now, the—this matter is set for consideration of a motion requesting this Court to set forth findings of fact and conclusions of law, specifically, I presume, relating to the case-management plan, so that it could serve as a basis to seek extraordinary relief in the West Virginia Supreme Court.

MR. FURR: Yes, Your Honor.

THE COURT: Now, who's going to speak?

MR. FURR: This is Jeff Furr, Your Honor, on behalf of the defendants. As the Court has recognized, we have decided again to seek review of the trial plan by writ, and perhaps out of an abundance of caution, but our interpretation of the Allstate v. Gaughan case is that it may be incumbent on us to request the Court to make findings of fact and conclusions of law and reduce that to writing in order for the Supreme Court to be properly able to consider our writ.

THE COURT: Okay.

MR. BARBER: Judge, this is Tim Barber, as you well know, the rules require a final judgment to make findings of fact and conclusions of law under 54(b). That's really not required in this thing; however, we do have a transcript of the hearing that you had in May, in which you articulate at length why you're doing all this.

And that's part of the transcript, and these guys, if they want to go up on a writ, you've made it clear what your findings—in that transcript. It's not a real question about it, and for them—I think they've come up with some kind of a thing about that you—something that's self—a bootstrap operation for them to be able to go to the Supreme Court.

If you want to take your transcript and you want to articulate your findings of fact that are different in some respects from the—from that in which that you already have articulated, then that's fine. But we believe that you—it's a matter of record; it's in the transcript.

Frankly, Judge, in the past, Pamela Campbell, who's on this phone message with us, has always supposedly authored these orders. And, of course, in this case they lost, so she apparently decided not to enter an order reflecting that. Nevertheless, it is a matter of record that they can go to the Supreme Court, as you very well know, and say this is the ruling of the judge.

Now, if you want to change it in some fashion, then you—we'll be glad to provide you with a copy of the transcript of your findings, and that's it. We are not—to have an appetite to convenience Mr. Furr or these defendants for going again, over and over again. And this again is going to be an effort to try to delay this thing again from the March date, which we oppose.

But I've said all I'm going to. Ken McClain is on here with me. We have—if he wants to add something to what I just said, that's fine.

MR. McCLAIN: No, Judge, I don't.

THE COURT: All right.

MR. FURR: Jeff Furr. I looked very closely. Frankly, I have no idea what the response to the argument really is, but, nonetheless, I indicated that we were doing this out of an abundance of caution.

I think that one thing that no one should want, including the plaintiffs, is for the Supreme Court to decline to accept our writ because it was under the—because it concluded that it did not know enough about the trial plan yet in order to review it properly.

But under Gaughan we made this motion; we think that further articulation of the Court's views of the—its intentions with respect to the trial plan might well be of assistance to the Supreme Court. As to why the last order has not been entered yet, I'd have to defer to Pam and let her explain to you what the delay has been.

THE COURT: Well, let me just respond. I've given this a lot of thought, and I've gone back and I have—all the way back and reread my memorandum of opinion and order that grew out of the Allstate case.

And then, of course, that basically served as a basis for the certified question that went to the Supreme Court, and I reread their opinion and the various other ancillary opinions.

And I then looked at the—as to whether or not the Philip Morris versus Williams case may have—requires additional findings of fact.

I think, and I believe that I've already made them. And the trial plan—and what I'm basically doing is taking the lead from the opinion of Justice Maynard, and I don't believe that the Williams case changes that. And I said that, and I'm not going to change my views on that.

And the trial plan as approved so far by the West Virginia Supreme Court by their opinion, which was filed December 2, 2005, is still continuing, and I don't think anything more is needed.

I do think the record and the reason—when I laid all these various reasons as to why the trial plan is going to continue, it was really in—I had in mind those being the findings of fact and conclusions of law.

So you can take those—and I think the Gaughan case, basically, and I understand why you're concerned about it. But I think it satisfies any requirement the Supreme Court might have regarding this issue.

So I'm just going to stand on what I have already said.

MR. FURR: Thank you. You understand I said we were doing this out of abundance of caution.

THE COURT: I appreciate that, I do; that's fine. As far as I'm concerned, all I want to do now—you obviously can do what you feel you have to do to protect your clients' interests. That's fine. As far as I'm concerned right now, I'm just trying to get ready for the March trial date. So until—

MR. BARBER: Judge, not to interrupt, but—this is Tim Barber—because—that, apparently, we prevailed in this thing, I'm going to go ahead and draft the order myself.

And so could we just simply say that the motion is denied based upon the fact that you have already articulated in your previous ruling of your—the reasons behind your findings, but—your decision. Would that be—

THE COURT: The reasons being . . .

MR. BARBER: Brief, very, very brief order?

THE COURT: The reason behind my decision to continue with the original trial plan as formulated and as, I believe, endorsed by the opinion filed December 2, 2005, and the subsequent findings of fact, conclusions of law that I made just ratifying that, yes, that's it.

MR. BARBER: Thank you, Judge.

THE COURT: Thank you all very much.

UNIDENTIFIED SPEAKER: Thank you.

THE COURT: Okay, Be seated, please. Good afternoon, everybody.

MR. FURR: Good afternoon, Your Honor.

THE COURT: All right. We got some matters to address here today, I guess. I don't know the order that you want to take them in.

I guess probably something that we should address and dispose of as expeditiously as possible is the defendants' motion to vacate the trial plan in light of the recent United States Supreme Court case of Philip Morris versus Williams.

Were you stretching or did you—

(Laughter.)

* * *

MR. GADDES: Sorry, Your Honor, I was getting ready to talk, but looks like Your Honor might have something else to say first.

THE COURT: I have read it all, read everybody's papers. And I always like to hear good argument, but as I—this is now the second time that we're back looking at the validity, I guess, of the original case-management plan. The first was in light of the Campbell case, and now in light of the Williams case. And do either of those cases do anything to recommend an alteration to the case-management plan?

As you all know, we're not going to rehash Campbell. The West Virginia Supreme Court has spoken on that, and that's the final word.

The question now is: What has Williams added or subtracted at all to what the West Virginia Supreme Court has said in terms of validating the case-management plan?

If you—this is how I look at Williams as it relates to the case-management plan. And I believe the core holding—anytime the United States Supreme Court gets involved in discussing punitive damages, there's a hell of a lot more heat than light on where we're going. You end up just eating your own tail as to really what they're trying to say.

But I think what, in this case, Justice Breyer was saying that—he says:

The question we addressed today concerns a large state court punitive damage award, and we're asked whether the constitution's due-process clause permits a jury to base that award in part upon its desire to punish the defendant for harming persons who are not before the Court, for example, victims whom the parties do not represent, and we hold that such an award would amount to taking the property from the defendant without due process.

I guess, basically, the core of what they were trying to say—they use a lot of words to say that, but I think that's basically what they were saying, and I believe that, in this case, that we simply do not have parties who are not before the Court.

Everybody, every plaintiff in this case, is a party in the whole scheme of things, both in terms of Phase I and Phase II. There are a group of plaintiffs; there are no non-parties in this case.

At some point in Phase II you're going to get down to specifics relating to individual plaintiffs on issues of causation and other individual issues that have to be decided, and how they may have been harmed by a particular product, and to the extent would the multiplier, if in fact there is a multiplier, apply to any compensatory award. But that's in Phase II.

Phase I, which would be tried basically when you try the product defect, and, as we said way back—and the case of Alkire versus First National Bank of Parsons probably does more to assist in formulating how a punitive-damage claim should be tried, I think, than every court in the United States. Just so happens in this case it applies to West Virginia because it sets out—it doesn't get too confused.

You see, the problem—what many times happens, I think, in punitive damage is, you start to overlap when you get into the issues of the size of the award, the ratios, reprehensibility, and that becomes mixed into the whole question of whether or not you're even entitled to punitive damages.

Everything gets—it's one big stew, and what we try to do in West Virginia is to make it a little easier. And that was—what we said in Alkire is: Okay, forget about TXO and forgot about Garnes initially; just put that aside; don't jump to that yet. Let's first off, obviously, determine if there's liability and, then, determine under the standard of Mayer versus Frobe, the standard which we still use in these kind of cases.

There are some other punitive damage cases that use another standard, but that's not involved here. There's an actual malice standard in some insurance cases which doesn't apply here.

But you then put on your evidence and—as we'll do in this case—and the conduct of all the defendants as it relates to Mayer versus Frobe once we get into the—into that phase of the case.

And the jury will be asked initially—well, even before we get there, there will be a determination made, as a matter of law, as to whether or not that question should even go to the jury: Is there enough evidence presented that would carry to the jury whether or not the standard of Mayer versus Frobe have been violated? Let's say: Yes, there has been. So the jury gets the question.

Initially, when you—on your first part of the case here, you'll be arguing product defect and conduct. That's all at that point. And the jury comes back, and let's assume the product is defective by whatever standard we use, they come back and say: Yes. All the defendants have acted improperly insofar as all the plaintiffs are concerned in this case. They won't know them, of course; we know them. But their conduct is such that, once a plaintiff shows that they smoked that particular product, then they would be the beneficiary of whatever punitive damage award would be awarded.

Now you get, now you get down—it's over; that part's over. You tell the jury: Go home, come back the next day. Next day you come back, and now you try all the issues of reprehensibility, of—well, of TXO and Garnes and all the standards that are contained in those cases.

That's where you get to the relationship between the harm, and you get to the question of reprehensibility seems to be on everybody's mind in Williams. You get to that as it relates to the plaintiffs in this case.

There are no nonparties. I guess that's a terrible—probably bad English, but that's why I don't think Williams even—as, a matter of fact, I quite frankly thought, and I said it—I thought Campbell was a case that may have impacted more on this plan than did the Williams case, and it didn't, well, according to the West Virginia Supreme Court.

So I'm not going to change the trial plan. As a matter of fact, if—and maybe it was the mood that I was in this past weekend when I looked at this thing. I feel stronger than ever that it is—that it is a proper plan.

It's going to take a lot of work; it's not easy. We're going to have to be very, very skillful in how we—in one of your papers, you said: Doesn't make any difference about the interrogatories.

I think the verdict form here and how we approach the jury is going to be very important. We can't ignore that. But I think that's—that's how this case can proceed on without in any way—now, maybe the United States Supreme Court will get another case and maybe come out, and things will be a little different. Hopefully, this case will be tried at least at this level before then.

So for those reasons, the motion to vacate the trial plan will be denied, and the objection of the—all the defendants will be saved to that ruling. All right.

I don't know what else we have. We have now—there's a motion—is this set for today, the motion to dismiss the 58 plaintiffs?

MR. HALL: The agenda letter we got, Your Honor, only had the motion to vacate the trial plan.

THE COURT: What else are we hearing today?

MR. LONG: Nothing, that was all that was on the agenda letter.

THE COURT: That's all?

MR. LONG: Yeah.

THE COURT: That's all we came for?

MR. LONG: That's it.

THE COURT: You drove all this way? Well, I shouldn't say that. You mean, I spent all this time. Is that all we're doing today?

MR. McCLAIN: As far as we know.

THE COURT: Is that all we're going to today?

MR. GADDES: Uh-huh.

THE COURT: When are we doing this other stuff?

MR. McCLAIN: Later.

THE COURT: Okay. Well, everybody. Now, you know—let's now get—we know we have a trial date set. Now, gentlemen, ladies, whatever you want to do, you do.

MR. FURR: We understand.

THE COURT: You've never stood on ceremonies before. My skin is, in this case, is as a rhinoceros. You just do what you have to do. But right now we're still set for March 17th.

And you want me to give you another date for some of this other stuff. What do you want me to do? I got the whole afternoon. I got to go home and play with my dog.

MR. HALL: I think that's the big issue before the Court, honestly, Your Honor, and some of these other issues are fairly inconsequential. I don't see a real need to set up a hearing and come back here for another 20 minutes to deal with some of the—

THE COURT: No, as a matter of fact, some of this stuff, quite frankly, and we have before, if you want to deal with it by telephone, we can do it by telephone, I don't care.

MR. McCLAIN: We would prefer that if you would do that.

THE COURT: Doesn't make any difference to me. That's fine. Are things moving along on these—I gathered, in regard to these encumbered plaintiff thing—I don't understand what's going on, to tell you the truth.

But it's not set for today, then we better set it down fairly quickly. Get a time when everybody is all right here and then give Doreen a call and set it down. If you want to it by phone, be happy to do it by phone. All right.

Sorry to get you all out.

MR. McCLAIN: Thank you, Judge.

MR. HALL: Thank you, Your Honor.

IN THE CIRCUIT COURT OF OHIO COUNTY,
WEST VIRGINIA

IN RE: TOBACCO LITIGATION

(INDIVIDUAL PERSONAL INJURY CASES)

Civil Action No. 00-C-5000

(JUDGE ARTHUR M. RECHT)

MEMORANDUM OF OPINION AND ORDER

(Scope of issues to be tried in Phases I and Ia of the Case Management Order)

The defendants appear to be vexed concerning the issues to be tried in phase I (the defect, if any, of each defendant's product) and Ia (each defendant's conduct). Hopefully, this opinion and order will remove any confusion about what will be tried in phase I.<sup>1</sup>

Phase I concentrates on each defendant's product in terms of whether it was defective and the conduct of each defendant to the extent that a punitive damage award is warranted against each defendant,

<sup>1</sup> There are actually only two phases contemplated by the case management order. Phase I, which collectively includes each defendant's product defect, if any, and each defendant's conduct measured against the standards of Mayer v. Frobe, 40 W. Va. 246, 22 S.E. 58 (1895), Phase II, which includes individual plaintiff issues of causation, extent of injuries and damages. Throughout the remainder of this opinion references will be made only to Phase I and its broadest sense and, if necessary, Phase II, as opposed to phases I and Ia.

and if so, what the punitive damage award should be expressed in terms of a punitive damage multiplier.

The perspective of Phase I is each defendant's product and each defendant's conduct. Testimony will concentrate on each defendant's product vis-a-vis product defect with appropriately formulated interrogatories dedicated to each defendant.

Phase I testimony will also concentrate on each defendant's conduct within the framework of Mayer v. Frobe, supra.

At the close of the case a determination will be made as to whether, as a matter of law, the jury should determine if any of the defendants' conduct justifies a punitive damage award: If that determination is in the affirmative to any or all defendants, the jury will be given appropriate formulated interrogatories directed to that defendant whose conduct as a matter of law warranted further jury consideration.

In the event the jury finds that any defendants' conduct warrants a punitive damage award, then further testimony will be presented to the jury within the paradigms contained in: Garnes v. Flemming Landfill, Inc., 186 W.Va. 656, 413 S.E.2d 897 (1991); TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Res. Corp., 187 W.Va. 457, 419 S.E. 2d 870 (1992); and Campbell v. State Farm, 530 U.S. 408, 123 S.Ct. 1134, 155 L.Ed.2d 585 (2003), to determine the amount of the punitive damage award, again expressed within an appropriately formulated interrogatory. See, Alkire v. First National Bank of Parsons, 197 W.Va. 22, 475 S.E.2d 122 (1996).

It is so ORDERED.

A copy of this Memorandum of Opinion and Order has been mailed this date to liaison counsel for the plaintiffs, Cindy Kiblinger, Esquire, James F. Humphries and Associates, United Center, 505 Virginia Street East, Suite 800, Charleston, WV 25301; and liaison counsel for the defendants, Pamela Kandzari Campbell, Esquire, Allen Guthrie McHugh and Thomas, P.O. Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

In re TOBACCO LITIGATION

(Personal Injury Cases)

No. 32552.

Submitted: Sept. 20, 2005.

Filed: Dec. 2, 2005.

Syllabus by the Court

The United States Supreme Court's decision in State Farm v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408 (2003), does not preclude the bifurcation of a trial into two phases wherein certain elements of liability and a punitive damages multiplier are determined in the first phase and compensatory damages and punitive damages, based on the punitive damages multiplier, are determined for each individual plaintiff in the second phase.

Justice MAYNARD delivered the Opinion of the Court.

Justice STARCHER concurs and reserves the right to file a concurring opinion.

Justice BENJAMIN concurs and reserves the right to file a concurring opinion.

MAYNARD, Justice.

This case concerns the following certified question from the Circuit Court of Ohio County:

Does the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, as interpreted by State Farm v. Campbell, preclude a bifurcated trial plan in a consolidated action consisting of personal injury claims of approximately 1,000 individual smokers, wherein Phase I of the trial would decide certain elements of liability and a punitive damages multiplier and Phase II of the trial would decide for each plaintiff compensatory damages and punitive damages based upon the punitive damages multiplier determined in Phase I?

For the reasons that follow, we answer the certified question in the negative.

FACTS

On September 28, 1999, then Chief Justice Larry Starcher entered an administrative order, pursuant to Rule 26 of the West Virginia Trial Court Rules for Trial Courts of Record, consolidating and transferring all similar tobacco litigation pending at that time to the Circuit Court of Ohio County with Judge Arthur M. Recht, a member of the Mass Litigation Panel, presiding. According to the parties, the litigation now includes approximately 1,100 individual plaintiffs' claims.

On January 11, 2000, the circuit court entered a "Case Management Order/Trial Plan"<sup>2</sup> that ordered the consolidation of all pending personal injury tobacco cases in a single consolidated trial, with the trial issues to be bifurcated as follows:

(a) Phase I-General liability issues common to all defendants including, if appropriate, defective product theory; negligence theory; warranty theory; and any other theories supported by pretrial development.

Also to be tried in Phase I will be entitlement to punitive damages[.]

(b) Phase II-Individual claims of the plaintiffs whose cases have been consolidated. Either separate individual juries, judge or judges will independently address issues unique to each plaintiff's compensatory damages and any other individual issues in reasonably sized trial groups or on an individual basis.

The defendant tobacco companies ultimately moved to revise this trial plan by removing the issue of the entitlement to and, if appropriate, the amount of punitive damages from the jury's consideration in Phase I of the trial based on the U.S. Supreme Court case of State Farm v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408 (2003). By order of June 16, 2004, the circuit court vacated and set aside the January 11, 2000, trial plan order. The circuit court found that Campbell stands for the principle that the conduct of a party against whom

The circuit court further found that “[t]he emphasis upon a subjective analysis of the defendant’s conduct vis-a-vis a specific plaintiff requires that the defendant’s conduct be tailored to each plaintiff[,]” and concluded that this could not be accomplished under the existing trial plan order. The circuit court certified the question set forth above to this Court in a September 24, 2004, order and answered the question in the affirmative.

DISCUSSION

The issue before is whether the United States Supreme Court’s decision in State Farm v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408 (2003) precludes bifurcation as originally ordered by the circuit court wherein the punitive damages multiplier would be determined prior to the assessment of compensatory damages for each plaintiff.

The plaintiffs below support the circuit court’s vacated trial plan. They assert that the plan did not violate Campbell, which, they allege, is not a fundamental change of long-standing punitive damages law but rather is perfectly consistent with such law. The defendant tobacco companies, on the other hand, challenge the circuit court's trial plan essentially on the basis that it violates Campbell by permitting the plaintiffs to show the reprehensibility of the defendants' conduct,<sup>3</sup> for the purpose of proving the appropriateness of punitive damages, by admitting evidence of conduct that was dissimilar to the conduct that injured particular plaintiffs. The defendants assert that evidence of prior bad conduct must be related to the defendant's actions toward individual plaintiffs in order to be relevant to the punitive damages analysis.

In Campbell, the insureds brought an action against their insurer, State Farm, to recover for bad-faith failure to settle within the policy limits and damages for fraud and intentional infliction of emotional distress. A jury awarded the insureds $2.6 million in compensatory damages and $145 million in punitive damages, which the trial court reduced to $1 million and $25 million respectively. On appeal, the Utah Supreme Court reinstated the $145 million punitive damages award. The United States Supreme Court subsequently reversed the punitive damages award because it found it to be "neither reasonable nor proportionate to the wrong committed," and "an irrational and arbitrary deprivation of the property of the defendant” in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Campbell, 538 U.S. at 429. The Court explained that the insureds’ attempt to show the reprehensible conduct of State Farm by introducing evidence of State Farm’s business practices for over 20 years in numerous states was constitutionally improper. According to the Court:

<sup>3</sup> In Garnes v. Fleming Landfill, Inc., 413 S.E.2d 897 (1991), this Court held that the jury may consider the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct including whether and how often the defendant engaged in similar conduct in the past. We believe that Campbell does not materially alter this holding. Rather, Campbell generally addresses the requirement that evidence of prior bad conduct must be "similar."

The [insureds] have identified scant evidence of repeated misconduct of the sort that injured them. Nor does our review of the Utah courts’ decisions convince us that State Farm was only punished for its actions toward the [insureds]. Although evidence of other acts need not be identical to have relevance in the calculation of punitive damages, the Utah court erred here because evidence pertaining to claims that had nothing to do with a third-party lawsuit was introduced at length. Other evidence concerning reprehensibility was even more tangential. For example, the Utah Supreme Court criticized State Farm’s investigation into the personal life of one of its employees and, in a broader approach, the manner in which State Farm’s policies corrupted its employees. The [insureds’] attempt to justify the courts’ reliance upon this unrelated testimony on the theory that each dollar of profit made by underpaying a third-party claimant is the same as a dollar made by underpaying a first-party one. For the reasons already stated, this argument is unconvincing. The reprehensibility guidepost does not permit courts to expand the scope of the case so that a defendant may be punished for any malfeasance, which in this case extended for a 20-year period. In this case, because the [insureds] have shown no conduct by State Farm similar to that which harmed them, the conduct that harmed them is the only conduct relevant to the reprehensibility analysis.

538 U.S. at 423-24 (citations omitted).

After carefully considering the parties' arguments and the Supreme Court's decision in Campbell, this Court finds that Campbell, which did not involve mass tort litigation, does not per se preclude the circuit court's original trial plan. We emphasize that the question before this Court is a narrow one. Accordingly, our answer is strictly limited to this narrow question. Our response is limited to the issue of whether State Farm v. Campbell precludes a bifurcated trial plan like the one below. Further, we do not address whether there may be other legal reasons to question the circuit court's bifurcated trial plan. Nor do we, or indeed can we, address in the abstract the specific evidence that may be presented on the issue of reprehensibility. Our conclusion in this case simply is, first, we find nothing in Campbell that mandates a reexamination of our existing system of mass tort litigation. Second, we find nothing in Campbell that per se precludes a bifurcated trial plan in which a punitive damages multiplier is established prior to the determination of individual compensatory damages. Beyond this, we leave more specific issues for another day. As this Court stated in State ex rel. Mobil Corp. v. Gaughan, 563 S.E.2d 419 (2002), we cannot substantively address Mobil's concerns regarding the potential use of a matrix, or a punitive damage multiplier, because the trial court has not yet definitively ruled upon the use of either of these mechanisms. Accordingly, any consideration of these issues at this time would be clearly premature. The trial court's announcement to postpone for the time being, any decision regarding the potential use of a matrix underscores the precipitous nature of ruling on this issue at this juncture. Matters such as a matrix and the use of a punitive damage multiplier, given the unresolved nature of the use of such mechanisms, can be better addressed by this Court upon appeals taken from final orders.

Gaughan, 563 S.E.2d at 426. Similarly, in the instant case, any issue beyond that set forth in the certified question is one that this Court will only consider on appeal with the benefit of a fully developed record and a final order. To reiterate, it is clear to this Court that Campbell does not eliminate mass tort litigation as provided for in our Trial Court Rule 26. Further, it is significant to us that bifurcated trial plans structured like the one at issue are common in West Virginia as well as other jurisdictions. In sum, absent a clear indication to the contrary, we believe that Campbell does not preclude the bifurcated trial plan at issue.

The circuit court found in its order setting aside its original trial plan, and the defendants agree, that “the conduct of a party against whom punitive damages are sought must have a direct nexus to a specific person who claims to have been damaged by that conduct.” Further, “[t]he emphasis upon a subjective analysis of the defendant's conduct vis-avis a specific plaintiff requires that the defendant's conduct be tailored to each plaintiff. That cannot be accomplished under the existing Case Management Order." We reject the circuit court's application of Campbell.

Campbell stands for the principle, among others, that "[a] defendant's dissimilar acts, independent from the acts upon which liability was premised, may not serve as the basis for punitive damages. A defendant should be punished for the conduct that harmed the plaintiff, not for being an unsavory individual or business." 538 U.S. at 422-23. Notably, the facts in Campbell were quite extreme. As noted above, the plaintiffs in Campbell brought what the Supreme Court characterized as a third-party bad faith claim against their insurer. In order to show the reprehensibility of the insurer's conduct, the plaintiffs were permitted to introduce evidence of insurer misconduct that had nothing to do with the type of misconduct that injured them. "For example, the Utah Supreme Court [in upholding the verdict in Campbell] criticized State Farm's investigation into the personal life of one of its employees and, in a broader approach, the manner in which State Farm's policies corrupted its employees." Campbell, 538 U.S. at 424.

In application of this principle to the instant case, it is the role of the circuit court to ensure that the plaintiffs' evidence is relevant, reasonably related to the acts upon which liability is premised, and supports their claim for punitive damages. Therefore, we find nothing in the circuit court's original trial plan that prevents the admission of evidence that is proper under Campbell.

Another concern raised by the defendants is that the circuit court's original trial plan would not ensure that punitive damages are proportionate to the injury caused to individual plaintiffs. Again, we disagree. As noted above, the circuit court's original trial plan anticipates that the defendants' general liability and a punitive damages multiplier would be determined in the first trial phase. In the second phase, compensatory damages would be determined for each individual plaintiff after individual evidence is presented. Finally, the punitive damages multiplier determined in the first phase would be applied to each plaintiff's compensatory damages award in order to reach the proper amount of punitive damages for each plaintiff.

Concerning the proper ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages, the Court in Campbell opined, we have been reluctant to identify concrete constitutional limits on the ratio between harm, or potential harm, to the plaintiff and the punitive damages award. We decline again to impose a bright-line ratio which a punitive damages award cannot exceed. Our jurisprudence and the principles it has now established demonstrate, however, that, in practice, few awards exceeding a single-digit ratio between punitive and compensatory damages, to a significant degree, will satisfy due process. In Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, [499 U.S. 1 (1991)] in upholding a punitive damages award, we concluded that an award of more than four times the amount of compensatory damages might be close to the line of constitutional impropriety.

We cited that 4-to-1 ratio again in [BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, [517 U.S. 559 (1996)]. The Court further referenced a long legislative history, dating back over 700 years and going forward to today, providing that sanctions of double, treble, or quadruple damages to deter and punish. While these ratios are not binding, they are instructive. They demonstrate what should be obvious: Single-digit multipliers are more likely to comport with due process, while still achieving the State's goal of deterrence and retribution, than awards with ratios in range of 500 to 1, or, in this case, 145 to 1.

Campbell, 538 U.S. at 424-425 (citations omitted). The defendants below contend that by determining the punitive damages multiplier prior to determining individual compensatory damages, there is no way to ensure the proper ratio between the two. We disagree.

This Court has recognized the duty of trial courts to review punitive damage awards. See Bowyer v. Hi-Lad, Inc., 609 S.E.2d 895, 910 (2004) (stating that “[i]f a jury awards punitive damages to a litigant, a circuit court must carefully review the jury’s verdict”); Garnes v. Fleming Landfill, Inc., 413 S.E.2d 897 (1991) (setting forth the factors for trial courts to consider when reviewing awards of punitive damages). In cases like the instant one, we are confident that once individual compensatory and punitive damages awards are determined, the trial court can review each of the awards to ensure that it comports with the principles articulated in Campbell and other applicable cases.<sup>4</sup>

Therefore, we now hold that the United States Supreme Court's decision in State Farm v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408 (2003), does not preclude the bifurcation of a trial into two phases wherein certain elements of liability and a punitive damages multiplier are determined in the first phase and compensatory damages and punitive damages, based on the punitive damages multiplier, are determined for each individual plaintiff in the second phase.

Again, in answering the question certified to us, we have determined merely that the trial court's original trial plan is not violative of Campbell. Beyond this, we make no judgment on whether the trial court's original plan is the best method for trying the instant tobacco litigation. Further, we decline to tell the circuit court how to proceed. This Court has recognized that, management of [mass tort] cases cannot be accomplished without granting the trial courts assigned to these matters significant flexibility and leeway with regard to their handling of these cases. A critical component of that required flexibility is the opportunity for the trial court to continually reassess and evaluate what is required to advance the needs and rights of the parties within the constraints of the judicial system. Out of this need to deal with “mass litigation” cases in non-traditional and often innovative ways, TCR 26.01 was drafted and adopted.

<sup>4</sup> Punitive damages awards should also be assessed by the trial court in light of this Court's holdings in TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Res. Corp., 419 S.E.2d 870 (1992), aff'd, 509 U.S. 443 (1993), and Garnes, supra, and the holding of the United States Supreme Court in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, supra.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, we answer the certified question as follows:

Does the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, as interpreted by State Farm v. Campbell, preclude a bifurcated trial plan in a consolidated action consisting of personal injury claims of approximately 1,000 individual smokers, wherein Phase I of the trial would decide certain elements of liability and a punitive damages multiplier and Phase II of the trial would decide for each plaintiff compensatory damages and punitive damages based upon the punitive damages multiplier determined in Phase I?

Answer: No.

Certified question answered.

STARCHER, J., concurring.

I write separately to explain the “mass litigation” system that underlies the majority’s opinion, and to state why such a system is necessary. I also write to explain why the method chosen by the circuit court to assess punitive damages in this case is constitutional under the federal and state due process clauses.

The instant case represents a trial judge struggling to do precisely what the Rules of Civil Procedure and the Trial Court Rules told him to do: to do whatever was necessary “to secure the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action.” W.Va.R.Civ.Pro. Rule 1 [1998]. The defendants, however, contend that a speedy and inexpensive resolution of the question regarding whether they should be subject to punitive damages, for allegedly knowingly marketing a defective product, is contrary to their due process rights under the state and federal Constitutions. The defendants assert that the trial court is constitutionally mandated to deny the plaintiffs a just, speedy and inexpensive resolution of their claims in order that the defendants’ property rights may be fully protected.

The majority opinion properly rejects this ridiculous position. The defendants are certainly entitled to due process. But exactly what process is due is entirely dependent upon the trial judge’s discretion, and the trial judge’s duty to afford all parties due process.

In the current age, a single mistake by a product manufacturer can injure dozens, hundreds, or even thousands upon thousands of individuals. A few manufacturers take a callous, deliberate, and knowing approach and choose to ignore the injuries caused by their products, or conspire to conceal the problems with their products. Sometimes, the injuries caused by the product cover the nation and span many decades.

The classic example is asbestos. Asbestos is a rock, a wonderful, flexible, fibrous material that is mined from the ground and which gives strength and fire resistance to products. Unfortunately, asbestos is one of the most toxic substances known to the human body. When inhaled over a period of time, it can cause the lungs to form scar tissue that grows and fills the lungs decades after exposure to asbestos stops. Even when inhaled into the lungs in minute quantities, it can cause cancer.

Companies that used asbestos in their products first started learning about asbestos-related diseases in the 1910s and 1920s. But rather than warn the public not to breathe asbestos dust, or stop mixing asbestos into their products, the companies plowed ahead and concealed the dangers. It was not until the 1970s that the government finally took action to prevent the use of asbestos, and required companies to put warnings on their products that breathing asbestos dust was hazardous.

The plaintiffs who filed lawsuits for their asbestos-related injuries did not sue the defendants because the products contained asbestos. Instead, the lawsuits focused on the fact that the products did not bear labels warning the product's users of the dangers of inhaling asbestos fibers. In other words, these were "failure to warn" product defect cases. West Virginia, with its many chemical and power plants, has many thousands of citizens who were exposed to asbestos dust from the use of asbestos-containing products in the 1940s through the 1980s. As a result, many citizens have developed (or are even just now developing) lung diseases and cancers directly related to asbestos.

Plaintiffs filed lawsuits in counties across West Virginia. First there were a few cases in State court, then a few dozen, then hundreds, then thousands.<sup>1</sup> Circuit courts started to try the cases one at a time, but quickly abandoned that route; trying each case individually would have required hundreds of years. The same lawyers and the same witnesses were employed, using the same documents and evidentiary exhibits, on a full-time basis in counties throughout the State.<sup>2</sup> Every trial involved weeks of <sup>1</sup> See, e.g., State ex rel. H.K. Porter Co., Inc. v. White, 386 S.E.2d 25, 28 (1989) (“There are presently 114 asbestos-related personal injury actions pending before the respondent Judge White in the Circuit Court of Pleasants County. Of more immediate concern to the petitioner in this case, however, are ten (10) consolidated cases set for trial on October 23, 1989.”); Cline v. White, 393 S.E.2d 923, 927 n. 2 (1990) (“According to records kept by the administrative office of the Court, as of March 26, 1990, there were 1,605 asbestos claims pending in West Virginia.”).

<sup>2</sup> For instance, in State ex rel. H.K. Porter Co., Inc. v. White, 386 S.E.2d 25 (1989), the Court related the following circumstances about one lawyer representing one defendant that manufactured asbestos-containing products:

... H.K. Porter Company, Inc. has been a named defendant in approximately fifteen hundred (1,500) asbestos-related personal injury lawsuits throughout West Virginia, as well as sixty thousand (60,000) similar lawsuits throughout the United States. Since 1981, H.K. Porter Company, Inc. has been represented by the Auburn, Maine, law firm of Skelton, Taintor and Abbott. Steven F. Wright has served as Skelton, Taintor and Abbott's lead counsel in asbestos litigation since 1985, and, as a result, he has appeared in numerous state and federal jurisdictions in the United States.

In October, 1988, Mr. Wright was retained to represent H.K. Porter Company, Inc. on a regional basis and he became responsible for case disposition in Maine, New testimony to try the same issues about the same defendants again and again and again. Virtually everything pertaining to the defendants remained the same. The only issues that changed concerned the plaintiffs, namely the existence and degree of each plaintiff's injury and damages, which defendants' products caused the injury, and the relative fault of each defendant for the plaintiff's damages.

This Court recognized that special procedures were required to address this judicial administrative nightmare, and the current "mass litigation" system grew into being.

Starting in the late 1980s, a handful of circuit judges-myself included-were specially trained in handling complex, "toxic tort" litigation. Using its constitutional administrative authority, the Court transferred asbestos cases from throughout the State to a handful of counties for these specially-trained circuit judges to resolve. Once the asbestos cases were before a single judge, the judge used the authority provided by Rule 42(a) of the Rules of Civil Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and West Virginia. The petitioners state that H.K. Porter Company, Inc. "relies upon Attorney Wright as the attorney to whom it has given ultimate responsibility for settlement or trial of asbestos cases in West Virginia consistent with its national policies and procedures for defending such cases.

386 S.E.2d at 27-28. The Court further noted that the attorney had appeared in 1,500 asbestos-related personal injury actions in West Virginia in twenty-four months, and that "Mr. Wright included a list of his appearances at six trials in West Virginia from 1987 to 1989 on behalf of the H.K. Porter Company, Inc." 386 S.E.2d at 28 n. 4.

Procedure [1998] to manage the case. Rule 42 provides, in part:

When actions involving a common question of law or fact are pending before the court, it may order a joint hearing or trial of any or all matters in issue in the actions; it may order all the actions consolidated; and it may make such orders concerning proceedings therein as may tend to avoid unnecessary costs or delay....

Initially, instead of trying cases individually, cases with a common theme were grouped together for trial. The plaintiffs' cases were first placed in groups of twenty or thirty for trial. Usually, the plaintiffs all worked for the same employer or at the same work site, around the same time periods, and were therefore usually injured by the same defendants' products.

But when the numbers of cases began to reach into the thousands, judges adjusted their approach. Several thousand cases were "massed" together into one proceeding, and through the use of Rule 42, the cases were broken down into various sub-proceedings with common issues of law or fact for separate trials.

In run-of-the-mill litigation this Court has indicated that bifurcation of a case into mini-trials is generally disfavored. As we stated in Syllabus Point 4 of Sheetz, Inc. v. Bowles Rice McDavid Graff & Love, PLLC, 547 S.E.2d 256 (2001):

West Virginia jurisprudence favors the consideration, in a unitary trial, of all claims regarding liability and damages arising out of the same transaction, occurrence or nucleus of operative facts, and the joinder in such trial of all parties who may be responsible for the relief that is sought in the litigation.

However, in mass litigation cases, we have given trial judges substantial leeway to craft the procedures necessary to avoid unnecessary costs or delay. Asbestos cases continued to be litigated as thousands of individual personal-injury claims against dozens of asbestos-using manufacturers were filed. The process for managing this litigation continued to change gradually. For example, by using Rule 42(a), judges began to bifurcate the asbestos cases into two separate proceedings. The first proceeding involved questions of law and fact that were common as to the defendants; the second proceeding involved questions common to the plaintiffs.

In the first proceeding, often called the “liability phase,” one jury would see evidence regarding common questions of law and fact pertaining to the defendants.<sup>3</sup> Experts would testify about the uses of asbestos, the diseases caused by asbestos, and would show the jury decades-old documents and discuss what the various defendants knew about the dangers of asbestos and when. The primary question for the jury to consider was this: considering the state-of-the-art knowledge of manufacturing in the 1940s, 1950s, 1960s, or 1970s, did each defendant manufacture a product that was defective because it failed to come with an adequate warning about the dangers of inhaling asbestos fibers?

<sup>3</sup> Actually, at times there was more than one jury. When the numbers of defendants in a single trial became unmanageable, the defendant manufacturers were divided into different courtrooms with different juries. The defendants were grouped with other defendants with similar characteristics (for instance, asbestos-using gasket makers or glove manufacturers). The juries were brought together into one courtroom to hear evidence common to all defendants—like scientific evidence about the types of injuries caused by asbestos—and separated to hear evidence unique to each defendant.

With this first phase of the proceeding, the plaintiffs and the defendants avoided thousands of days of courtroom work in individual trials. The same lawyers were not required to use the same witnesses to repeatedly retry the same questions. By trying those questions once for all the plaintiffs, Rule 42(a) permitted a court to avoid “unnecessary costs or delay”-for both plaintiffs and defendants.

A corollary question addressed by the jury in the first proceeding concerned punitive damages. If the defendant actually knew about the dangers of asbestos in the 1940s, 1950s, 1960s, or 1970s—and many did—then the jury was asked a second question: did the defendant callously, deliberately or greedily fail to warn the public of those dangers, and if so should the defendant be punished for its actions?

Many of the same witnesses and documents used to prove that the product was defective were also used to prove an entitlement to punitive damages. Both issues overlap and involve the actual knowledge of the defendant. If the defendant knew the product was inherently dangerous for its intended use, the product was defective. Likewise, if the defendant knew that the product was inherently dangerous for its intended use, and knew that the product was causing harm to individuals, and the defendant recklessly or deliberately kept marketing the defective product—well, that’s grounds for punitive damages.

Juries in the first proceeding could easily determine, yes or no, whether punitive damages should be assessed against a defendant. The problem in the first proceeding was with fixing the actual dollar amount of punitive damages. Since the first phase jury knew nothing of the degree of injury or specific financial circumstances of each of the thousands of plaintiffs, the jury could not knowledgeably determine what dollar amount of punitive damages would be fair for each plaintiff.

It is axiomatic that punitive damages must bear a “reasonable relationship” to the potential of harm caused by the defendant’s actions. Syllabus Point 1, Garnes v. Fleming Landfill, Inc., 413 S.E.2d 897 (1991). To meet this reasonable relationship requirement, we indicated in Syllabus Point 3 of Garnes that juries must be instructed using the following language:

Punitive damages should bear a reasonable relationship to the harm that is likely to occur from the defendant’s conduct as well as to the harm that actually has occurred. If the defendant’s actions caused or would likely cause in a similar situation only slight harm, the damages should be relatively small. If the harm is grievous, the damages should be greater.

Judges dealing with asbestos cases determined that the mandate of Garnes could be met by letting the jury in the first phase assess a “punitive damage multiplier.” The jury was asked to calculate a multiplier such that the final dollar amount of punitive damages paid by the defendant would bear a reasonable relationship to the harm that was likely to occur from the defendant's conduct as well as the harm that actually occurred. The punitive damage multiplier would be used in the second phase to multiply the amount of the plaintiff's compensatory damages to actually determine the dollar amount of the defendant's punitive damage liability.

In the second phase proceeding, questions of law and fact common to the plaintiffs would be resolved. The plaintiffs' cases would be broken down-into groups by the plaintiff's asbestos-related disease or by the plaintiff's work place, or even individually-and juries would hear evidence unique to each plaintiff. For instance, medical experts would discuss whether or not the plaintiff had an injury, and whether that injury was caused by asbestos. Economic experts would discuss the plaintiff's loss. Other experts would present evidence concerning the particular asbestos products that caused the plaintiff's injuries.

The second, "individual issues" or "damage phase" trials would begin with a brief statement to the jury by the lawyers about what happened in the first, "liability phase" trial. The juries would be instructed by the judge that the defendant's product was defective; the jury would only be charged with sorting out whether the defendant's product caused the plaintiff's injury, and the amount of the plaintiff's compensatory damages.

After the trial was complete, the judge would take the punitive damages multiplier determined in the first trial, multiply the plaintiff's compensatory damages by that multiplier, and thereby know the dollar amount of the punitive damages due and owing to the plaintiff. Furthermore, the judge would then conduct a post-trial review of the punitive damages award to ensure that the award was constitutionally fair and reasonably related to the harm that the defendant caused and could have caused to the plaintiff.<sup>4</sup>

By the mid-1990s, this Court recognized that other individual personal-injury actions with characteristics similar to asbestos were being filed. The Court therefore took steps to codify the procedures that evolved in the context of asbestos litigation.

When the trial court reviews an award of punitive damages, the court should, at a minimum, consider the factors given to the jury as well as the following additional factors:

- (1) The costs of the litigation;
- (2) Any criminal sanctions imposed on the defendant for his conduct;
- (3) Any other civil actions against the same defendant, based on the same conduct; and
- (4) The appropriateness of punitive damages to encourage fair and reasonable settlements when a clear wrong has been committed. A factor that may justify punitive damages is the cost of litigation to the plaintiff.

Because not all relevant information is available to the jury, it is likely that in some cases the jury will make an award that is reasonable on the facts as the jury know them, but that will require downward adjustment by the trial court through remittitur because of factors that would be prejudicial to the defendant if admitted at trial, such as criminal sanctions imposed or similar lawsuits pending elsewhere against the defendant. However, at the option of the defendant, or in the sound discretion of the trial court, any of the above factors may also be presented to the jury.

In 1999, the Court adopted Trial Court Rule 26.01, formalizing the “mass litigation” system. Rule 26.01 created a “Mass Litigation Panel” consisting of six judges, and empowered the Panel to resolve any “mass litigation” case that the Chief Justice of this Court referred to the panel.<sup>5</sup> Essentially, the judges on the Panel are the specially trained judges who are ready and willing to take on cases with common questions of law or fact where large numbers of individuals have potentially been harmed, physically or economically, as a result of a catastrophe or as a result of a defective product.

The trial judge in the instant case has been an active participant on the Panel, and has aggressively worked to resolve mass litigation cases. In the “Mass litigation” shall be defined as two (2) or more civil actions pending in one or more circuit courts: (a) involving common questions of law or fact in mass accidents or single catastrophic events in which a number of people are injured; or (b) involving common questions of law or fact in “personal injury mass torts” allegedly incurred upon numerous claimants in connection with widely available or mass-marketed products and their manufacture, design, use, implantation, ingestion, or exposure; or (c) involving common questions of law or fact in “property damage mass torts” allegedly incurred upon numerous claimants in connection with claims for replacement or repair of allegedly defective products, including those in which claimants seek compensation for the failure of the product to perform as intended with resulting damage to the product itself or other property, with or without personal injury overtones; or (d) involving common questions of law or fact in “economic loss” cases incurred by numerous claimants asserting defect claims similar to those in property damage circumstances which are in the nature of consumer fraud or warranty actions on a grand scale including allegations of the existence of a defect without actual product failure or injury.

instant case, it appears that he adopted the two-phase trial model that was used by judges in asbestos cases.

The defendants, however, insist that the bifurcation of these cases is improper. The defendants argue that they are entitled, pursuant to the due process clauses of the State and federal Constitutions, to try the question of punitive damages one case at a time, so that the jury can assess each defendant's culpability to each plaintiff individually. The defendants insist that the only way punitive damages may be reasonably related to the potential harm caused to an individual plaintiff is by a jury hearing evidence about both a defendant's conduct and the actual or potential harm to the plaintiff at the same time. In sum, the defendants assert that punitive damages can never be assessed in a "mass" litigation under Rule 42(a), or for that matter in a class action under Rule 23.

The inherent flaw with the defendants' argument is the assumption that due process, particularly to protect property rights, is a concrete concept. Instead, what process is due under the due process clause is determined under a sliding scale, and changes with the facts of each case. "When due process applies, it must be determined what process is due and consideration of what procedures due process may require under a given set of circumstances must begin with a determination of the precise nature of the government function involved as well as the private interest that has been impaired by government action." Syllabus Point 2, Bone v. W.Va. Dept. of Corr., 255 S.E.2d 919 (1979). "(D)ue process is flexible and calls for such procedural protections as the particular situation demands.” Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972). Necessarily implicit in the above quote, which was also expressed in Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976), is the principle that due process issues must be decided on the facts of the particular case. Once it is determined that due process applies, the question to be answered is “What process is due?”

The courtroom process that is due someone who has a few parking tickets is different from the procedural protections due a shoplifter, and vastly different from the process to be accorded someone who is accused of murder. And the due process protections for someone accused of a single murder are going to be different from someone accused of being a mass murderer, like Herman Goering or Saddam Hussein. Likewise, the amount of process that is due in a criminal case, where personal liberty or life is at stake, is different from the process that is due in a civil case, where only property interests are at stake.

The defendants argue that State Farm v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408 (2003), mandates that all evidence of punitive damages must be presented to the jury and heard in relation to the injury caused to each specific plaintiff. Ignoring the fact that Campbell involved one defendant who had caused harm to a husband and wife in one instance (and not dozens of defendants who caused harm to thousands of plaintiffs over several decades), the defendants argue that Campbell preempts West Virginia’s system of mass litigation. The inevitable result of accepting the defendants’ argument is that it creates a judicial administrative nightmare. The same lawyers would be working for years, probably decades, to present the same witnesses to testify using the same documents in each separate plaintiff's case.

If the majority opinion had accepted this reasoning by the defendants, we would essentially be saying that the more people a defendant injures with its defective product, the less likely the defendant is ever going to have to pay compensatory or punitive damages to the people injured by the product. The defendant would therefore be accorded a right to thousands upon thousands of individual trials that would cause the legal system to grind to a halt. At the same time, we would be telling the individual plaintiffs that they have no rights to any process—because of administrative gridlock, the individual plaintiffs would de facto be denied their day in court. The majority opinion rightly rejected this position.

As the members of this Court have noted before, State Farm v. Campbell presented no new law in the field of punitive damages. The case was nothing more than a summary, a collation, of prior case law. See Boyd v. Goffoli, 608 S.E.2d 169 (2004) (Davis, J., concurring) and (Starcher, J., concurring); Jackson v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins., 600 S.E.2d 346 (2004) (Davis, J., concurring) and (McGraw, J., concurring).

The due process protections mandated by State Farm v. Campbell and its predecessors are, as the majority opinion indicates, encompassed in the trial plan which the circuit court initially adopted. The first phase trial permits a jury to examine a defendant's relevant misconduct, and determine whether punitive damages should be assessed. If the jury believes that punitive damages are warranted, then the jury also determines a punitive damages multiplier that establishes a numerical relationship between the potential harm of a defendant's conduct and each plaintiff's compensatory damages. In the second phase proceeding, the trial judge actually multiplies the plaintiff's actual compensatory damages by the multiplier and establishes a punitive damages dollar figure. The circuit judge is then obligated by Garnes to review the punitive damages award to assess its fairness under the circumstances.

Under this process, thousands of allegedly injured plaintiffs will be permitted their day in court. The defendants will be permitted, in one proceeding instead of thousands, to contest the plaintiffs' claim that the defendants should pay punitive damages. And, if the trial judge determines this is the best course to take, the plaintiffs and the defendants will have secured the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action.

I therefore concur in the majority's decision.

BENJAMIN, J., concurring.

I write separately to emphasize not only what the Court's opinion does, but also what it does not do. This unanimous opinion answers a narrow question in a narrow manner. It does no more. It does no less.

I think it important to underscore the essence of the Court's opinion:

After carefully considering the parties' arguments and the Supreme Court's decision in Campbell, this Court finds that Campbell, which did not involve mass tort litigation, does not per se preclude the circuit court's original trial plan. We emphasize that the question before this Court is a narrow one. Accordingly, our answer is strictly limited to this narrow question.<sup>10</sup> Our response is limited to the issue of whether State Farm v. Campbell precludes a bifurcated trial plan like the one below. Further, we do not address whether there may be other legal reasons to question the circuit court's bifurcated trial plan. Nor do we, or indeed can we, address in the abstract the specific evidence that may be presented on the issue of reprehensibility. Our conclusion in this case simply is, first, we find nothing in Campbell that mandates a reexamination of our existing system of mass tort litigation. Second, we find nothing in Campbell that per se precludes a bifurcated trial plan in which a punitive damages multiplier is established prior to the determination of individual compensatory damages. Beyond this, we leave more specific issues for another day....

In this passage, the Court emphasizes the narrowness with which it approached and answered the certified question. In addition to twice stating that Campbell does not “per se” (by or in itself) preclude the circuit court's original trial plan, the Court twice specifically restricts its answer to the certified question, stating that we are “... not address[ing] whether there may be other legal reasons to question the circuit court’s bifurcated trial plan” and “[n]or do we, or indeed can we, address in the abstract the specific evidence that may be presented on the issue of reprehensibility.” These limitations merit attention.

Does the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, as interpreted by State Farm v. Campbell, preclude a bifurcated trial plan in a consolidated action consisting of personal injury claims of approximately 1,000 individual smokers, wherein Phase I of the trial would decide certain elements of liability and a punitive damages multiplier and Phase II of the trial would decide for each plaintiff compensatory damages and punitive damages based upon the punitive damages multiplier determined in Phase I?

Plaintiffs and defendants differ greatly herein on their views of the scope and commonality of the evidence of reprehensible conduct which may warrant consideration of punitive damages. Plaintiffs appear to contend that the evidence of reprehensible conduct is the same and applicable to all plaintiffs. In their amended brief, plaintiffs claim that all 1,000 of them “were harmed, not just by similar conduct, but by the exact same conduct—namely, defendants’ fraudulent concealment of the known hazards of smoking.” Thus, plaintiffs argue that this evidence is suitable for determining a single punitive damage multiplier for all of them. Since plaintiffs were all harmed by the same alleged conduct of defendants, plaintiffs contend that the trial court need not be concerned with similar and dissimilar conduct and that the jury, on the basis of this common reprehensible conduct, may apply one punitive damage multiplier to whatever compensatory damages may be subsequently awarded.

Defendants, on the other hand, contend that the evidence is diverse with no sameness applicable to all plaintiffs. Defendants therefore contend that such evidence is unsuitable for determining a single punitive damage multiplier fitting to all claimants. They claim in their response that plaintiffs have not limited their damages claim to recovery for fraudulent concealment, but also that plaintiffs seek recovery “for negligence and strict liability in the design, manufacture, and warning labels of cigarettes; strict liability in selling an unreasonably dangerous product; negligence in testing and researching; and negligence in their advertising and in the sale of cigarettes to minors.” Among other arguments, defendants contend that (1) evidence of concealment or failure to warn cannot be a basis of punitive damages for individual plaintiffs who were fully aware of the risks of smoking or of the facts supposedly concealed; (2) evidence relating to addiction cannot be a basis of punitive damages for individual plaintiffs who are not addicted; (3) evidence of misconduct in the 1950s or 1960s cannot be a basis of punitive damages for individual plaintiffs who didn’t start smoking until the 1970s or 1980s; (4) evidence relating to light cigarettes cannot be a basis of punitive damages for smokers of unfiltered cigarettes; and (5) evidence relating to a particular defendant against whom a plaintiff is pursuing no claim should not be a basis for that individual plaintiff’s punitive damages. Thus, defendants claim, a plaintiff could obtain (and some defendants could pay) punitive damages set by the application of a multiplier that was based on the misconduct of companies that those plaintiffs did not sue or on alleged reprehensible conduct of a defendant which is not even applicable to the specific plaintiff.

In responding to certified questions rather than in considering issues raised on properly perfected appeals, this Court necessarily lacks the intimate knowledge which the trial level circuit court has of all facets of the litigation below. We do not have a full and complete record before us in a consideration of a certified question. We therefore cannot, and indeed should not, in my opinion, determine whether all plaintiffs were harmed by the exact same conduct, as the plaintiffs contend, or, if harmed at all, whether plaintiffs were harmed by diverse conducts of different defendants, the products of which all plaintiffs did not smoke, as the tobacco companies claim. Nor has the Court done so in its answer to the certified question. The Court's opinion does not discuss the divergent views of the parties with respect to the evidence of reprehensible conduct. Nor has the Court expressed a view on which conducts on the part of the defendants are similar and which are dissimilar. Without such factual determinations having first been made, daunting and complex as that process may ultimately prove to be, this Court is in no position, in my opinion, to say ultimately whether Campbell's restricted view on evidence of reprehensibility, and the constitutional considerations which underlie such a view, would sanction a punitive damages multiplier as the circuit court's original two-phase trial plan envisioned. Judge Recht apparently thinks not, and I, for one, am in no position to disagree with him. Nor, as I read it, does the Court's opinion. In limiting its answer herein, the Court states that "[b]eyond [our limited response], we leave more specific issues for another day"; that "[m]atters such as a matrix and the use of a punitive damages multiplier, given the unresolved nature of the use of such mechanisms, can be better addressed by this Court upon appeals taken from final orders" quoting State ex rel. Mobil Corp. v. Gaughan, 563 S.E.2d 419, 426 (2002); and, most importantly, that “we decline to tell the circuit court how to proceed”.<sup>11</sup>

There is yet another significant sentence in the Court’s opinion which I believe needs emphasis: “[W]e do not address whether there may be other legal reasons to question the circuit court’s bifurcated trial plan.” Although not recently, this Court has said on many occasions that:

Punitive damages should not be awarded in any case where the amount of compensatory damages is adequate to punish the defendant; and, in a case where such compensatory damages are not adequate for the purpose of punishment, only such additional amount should be awarded as, taken together with the compensatory damages, will sufficiently punish the defendant.

<sup>11</sup> West Virginia is not alone in its concerns regarding the need for an efficient, yet procedurally proper, litigation of mass and complex civil cases. There may well be no “best” procedure for dealing with such cases in view of the differing nature of such cases. From my albeit limited research, I find that a number of jurisdictions have moved away from the type of trial plan originally proposed below, and I find no jurisdictions which have recently embraced such a plan. See, e.g., Liggett Group Inc. v. Engle, 853 So.2d 434, 451-2 (Fla. Ct. App. 2003), appeal granted, 873 So.2d 1222 (Fla. 2004); Philip Morris, Inc. v. Angeletti, 752 A.2d 200, 249 (Md. 2000); Southwestern Ref. Co. v. Bernal, 22 S.W.3d 425 (Tex. 2000); Smith v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. 174 F.R.D. 90, 97 (W.D. Mo. 1997). Whether this points to the presence of a trend that such a type of trial plan is now generally disfavored in the United States is not currently before this Court.

Fisher, 108 S.E. 872, 874 (1921); and Raines v. Faulkner, 48 S.E.2d 393, 399 (1947).

The principle of stare decisis is a fundamental foundation of our system of jurisprudence. It is the source of the predictability, balance and stability in the legal system necessary to permit individuals and companies to structure their affairs and have confidence in the surety of their rights. It is, by any other consideration, a necessary aspect of the “fairness” which litigants should rightfully expect they will have in our courts and for which confidence in the judicial system will be advanced. The United States Supreme Court has spoken on the duty of courts to follow precedent on many occasions. In Rodriguez de Quijas v. Shearson/American Exp., 490 U.S. 477, 484 (1989), the court admonished lower courts that “[i]f [its] precedent has direct application in a case, yet appears to rest on reasons rejected in some other line of decisions, [the lower court] should follow the case which directly controls, leaving to this Court the prerogative of overruling its own decisions.” I am not aware of any case of this Court which disturbs our holding in Marinari.

The lower court should, in my opinion, consider whether the principles repeated in Marinari and its progeny, as well as the constitutional principles and protections applicable herein, present “other legal reasons to question the circuit court’s bifurcated trial plan.” It could be that a jury given the opportunity to consider the assessment of punitive damages after having awarded compensatory damages may conclude that the magnitude of the compensatory damages awarded does not warrant the assessment of further damages to punish the defendants. Likewise, such a jury may conclude that the magnitude of the compensatory damages when considered with the defendant's proven reprehensible conduct could require punitive damages in excess of what a uniform multiplier would otherwise provide.<sup>12</sup>

It is the circuit court's decision how to proceed. It is hoped that counsel for the parties will endeavor to provide the circuit court with such support, suggestions, and recommendations as the circuit court may request to best determine the proper trial plan to utilize in this litigation.

<sup>12</sup> The Supreme Court in Campbell appears to have said as much when it stated that “[i]t should be presumed a plaintiff has been made whole for his injuries by compensatory damages, so punitive damages should only be awarded if the defendant's culpability, after having paid compensatory damages, is so reprehensible as to warrant the imposition of further sanctions to achieve punishment or deterrence.” 538 U.S. at 419 (Emphasis added.) The quoted statement from Campbell is consistent with Marinari and its progeny.

IN RE: TOBACCO LITIGATION
INDIVIDUAL PERSONAL INJURY CASES.

CIVIL ACTION NO. 00-C-5000

MEMORANDUM OF OPINION AND ORDER

PHASE I, CASE MANAGEMENT PLAN – PUNITIVE DAMAGE MULTIPLIER

Certain of the defendants<sup>1</sup> in the above captioned matter have moved to revise the initial Case Management Order/Trial Plan (herein Case Management Order) entered January 11, 2000, by removing the issue of the entitlement and, if appropriate, the amount of punitive damages from the jury's consideration in Phase I of the trial.

The defendants had initially objected to the consideration of punitive damages under the Case Management Order on a number of grounds relying in large part upon BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559 (1996).<sup>2</sup> The defendants' objection

Reynolds Tobacco Company; Lorillard Tobacco Company; Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation, individually and as successor by merger to the American Tobacco Company; British American Tobacco (Investments) Limited f/k/a British American Tobacco Company Limited; and B.A.T. Industries p.l.c.

was rejected because the concept of measuring the defendants' conduct so that the jury could consider whether any punitive damage multiplier was justified was determined to be the most efficient and expeditious manner of addressing the issues involved in the numerous individual personal injury cases, and yet satisfy the due process requirement formulated in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1 (1991); and TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443 (1993).<sup>3</sup> The defendants now ask this Court to revisit its objection to the inclusion of punitive damages in Phase I relying upon the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408 (2003).

This Court has read and reread Campbell in an effort to determine whether there is any conceivable manner to salvage the extant Case Management Order and still accommodate the due process demands of Campbell to require any punitive damage award to punish and deter conduct that has consider three guideposts: (1) the degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's; (2) the disparity between the actual or potential harm suffered by the plaintiff and the punitive damages award; and (3) the difference between the punitive damages awarded by the jury and the civil penalties authorized or imposed in comparable cases.

<sup>3</sup> The Case Management Plan was further determined to conform to Syllabus Point 3 of State ex rel. Appalachian Power Co. v. MacQueen, 198 W.Va. 1, 470 S.E.2d 300 (1996): "A creative, innovative trial management plan developed by a trial court which is designed to achieve an orderly, reasonably swift and efficient disposition of mass liability cases will be approved so long as the plan does not trespass upon the procedural due process rights to the parties."

a specific relationship to a specific injured party. It cannot be done.

The majority opinion in Campbell contains the recurring theme that the conduct of a party against whom punitive damages are sought must have a direct nexus to a specific person who claims to have been damaged by that conduct. For example:

“In light of these concerns in Gore, Supra, 517 U.S. 559, we instructed Courts reviewing punitive damages to consider three guideposts: ... (2) the disparity between the actual or potential harm suffered by the plaintiff and the punitive damage award...” Campbell, Supra, 538 U.S. 408, 418;

“The Utah Supreme Court’s opinion makes explicit that State Farm was being condemned for its nationwide policies rather than for the conduct direct towards the Campbells.” Campbell, Supra, 538 U.S. 408, 420;

“For a more fundamental reason, however, the Utah courts erred in relying upon this and other evidence: The court’s award of punitive damages to punish and deter conduct that bore no relation to the Campbell’s harm. A defendant’s dissimilar acts, independent from the acts upon which liability was premised, may not serve as the basis for punitive damages. A defendant should be punished for the conduct that harmed the plaintiff, not for being an unsavory individual or business. Due process does not permit courts, in the calculation of punitive damages, to adjudicate the merits of other parties' hypothetical claims against a defendant under the guise of the reprehensibility analysis, but we have no doubt the Utah Supreme Court did that here." Campbell, Supra, 538 U.S. 408, at 422, 423.

"The Campbells have identified scant evidence of repeated misconduct of the sort that injured them. Nor does our review of the Utah Court's decision convince us that State Farm was only punished for its actions toward the Campbells." Campbell, Supra, 538 U.S. 408, 423.

"In this case because the Campbells have shown no conduct by State Farm similar to that which harmed them, the conduct that harmed them is only conduct relevant to the reprehensibility analysis." Campbell, Supra, 538 U.S. 408, 424.

[Case Management Order/Trial Plan of the Circuit Court of Ohio County, West Virginia
(January 11, 2000)]

IN THE CIRCUIT COURT OF OHIO COUNTY,
WEST VIRGINIA

IN RE: TOBACCO LITIGATION

(INDIVIDUAL PERSONAL INJURY CASES)

CIVIL ACTION NO. 00-C-5000

(JUDGE ARTHUR M. RECHT

JUDGE TOD KAUFMAN)

CASE MANAGEMENT ORDER/TRIAL PLAN

1. All personal injury tobacco cases for plaintiffs now pending, filed in, or transferred to and accepted by this Court prior to August 15, 2000, shall be included in a single consolidated trial in Ohio County on June 4, 2001.

2. All pleadings shall be filed in the Circuit Court of Ohio County, West Virginia with the caption IN RE: TOBACCO LITIGATION (INDIVIDUAL PERSONAL INJURY CASES), Civil Action No. 00-C-5000 (Judge Arthur M. Recht and Judge Tod Kaufman).

3. The issues to be determined in the consolidated trial shall be bifurcated as follows:

(a) PHASE I – General liability issues common to all defendants including, if appropriate, defective product theory; negligence theory; warranty theory; and any other theories supported by pretrial development.

Also to be tried in Phase I will be entitlement to punitive damages within the definition of Syllabus Point 4, Mayer v. Probe, 40 W.Va. 246, 225 S.E. 58 (1895); Syllabus Points 3 and 4, Garnes v. Fleming Landfill, Inc., 186 W.Va. 656, 413 S.E.2d 897 (1991); Syllabus Point 15, TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 287 W.Va. 457, 419 S.E.2d 570 (1982); and Syllabus Point 7, Alkaire v. First National Bank of Parsons, 187 W.Va. 122, 475 S.E.2d 122 (1996).

(b) PHASE II – Individual claims of the plaintiffs whose cases have been consolidated. Either separate individual juries, judge or judges will independently address issues unique to each plaintiff's compensatory damages and any other individual issues in reasonably sized trial groups or on an individual basis.

4. Liaison counsel will be Troy Hughes of James P. Humphries & Associates, Bank One Center, 707 Virginia Street, East, Suite 1113, Charleston, WV 25301 for the plaintiffs and Pamela Kandzari of Allen, Guthrie & McHugh, 1300 Bank One Center, Charleston, WV 25301 for the defendants. They will be responsible for transmitting all court orders and court filings to the appropriate defense counsel and plaintiffs' counsel.

5. The following shall be established and observed relative to discovery and other activity in this trial:

(a) February 9, 2000, at 1:30 p.m. – Pretrial hearing (review case management/trial plan and motions);

(b) March 1, 2000 – As for each plaintiff presently included in the consolidated trial, plaintiffs provide baseline medical and factual information (i.e. plaintiff's name, address, date of birth, social security number, brand of tobacco product used, the time frame such products were used, where the plaintiff purchased such products, the injury the plaintiff suffered as a result of tobacco use, the date the plaintiff discovered or was diagnosed with the injury, and the date and cause of decedent's death) and a list identifying each plaintiff to be included in the consolidated trial as to each defendant.

(c) March 15, 2000 – Plaintiff provide list of all lay witnesses and all expert liability and medical witnesses by individual defendant which are intended for use at trial. As to each lay witness, plaintiffs shall identify the defendants against whom he/she is expected to testify. Such witnesses shall not be permitted to testify at trial as to any defendants not designated for that witness. Further, defendant not designated for that witness are not required to attend any deposition of such witness and do not waive their right to redepose that witness. Plaintiffs must provide all expert reports on this date. If an expert has not produced a report, a Rule 26(b)(4) interrogatory response shall be provided, which includes a summary of such experts opinion and expected testimony.

(d) April 15, 2000 – Defendants provide list of all lay witnesses, expert liability and medical witnesses. Defendants must provide all expert reports on this date. If an expert has not produced a report, a Rule 26(b)(4) interrogatory response shall be provided, which includes a summary of said expert's opinion and expected testimony;

(e) May 1 – November 30, 2000 – Expert and lay witness depositions shall be conducted during this period;

DEPOSITIONS - All sworn deposition testimony from any previous or contemporary tobacco litigation cases may be used in pretrial motion and at trial;

DOCUMENTS – All documents produced or filed by defendant tobacco companies with the federal government including but not limited to Congress and the FDA, shall be produced and reasonably identified to a designated depository in West Virginia with a current privilege log;

(f) June 2, 2000 at 3:00 p.m. – Pretrial Hearing (status and motions);

(g) July 14, 2000 at 3:00 p.m. – Pretrial Hearing (status and motions);

(h) August 11, 2000 at 3:00 p.m. – Pretrial Hearing (status and motions);

(i) September 8, 2000 at 3:00 p.m. – Pretrial Hearing (status and motions);

(j) September 29, 2000 – Last day on which plaintiffs and defendants may serve requests for admissions, with responses to such requests being due within the time period contemplated by the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure;

(k) October 20, 2000 at 3:00 p.m. – Pretrial Hearing (status and motions);

(l) October 31, 2000 – Deadline for filing complaints for cases to be included in consolidated trial. For civil actions filed subsequent to January 1, 2000, plaintiffs shall provide the baseline medical and factual information referred to in paragraph 5(c) within three weeks of filing of the civil action, or by October 31, 2000, whichever comes earlier. However, no plaintiffs' claims shall be included in this trial unless the aforesaid baseline medical and factual information has been provided to defendants by close of business on October 31, 2000;

(m) October 31, 2000 – Plaintiffs may supplement expert lay witness list by adding no more than three (3) expert or three (3) lay witnesses;

(n) November 17, 2000 – Plaintiffs designate exhibits and demonstrative materials applicable to each defendant which are intended for trial;

(o) December 1, 2000 – Defendants designate exhibits and demonstrative materials which are intended for use at trial;

(p) December 29, 2000 – Objections to plaintiffs exhibits and demonstrative material must be filed;

(q) January 26, 2001 – Objections to defendants' exhibits and demonstrative materials must be filed;

(r) February 5, 2001 – Beginning on or about February 5, 2001, the Court shall schedule a series of exhibit conferences. The initial conferences will involve exhibits purportedly applicable to all or substantially all of the defendants. The subsequent conference will be defendant specific. A defendant is only obligated to attend conferences related specifically to that defendant, including all defendants and defendants-specific conferences. If a defendant does not attend unrelated exhibit conferences (i.e. unrelated other defendant conferences), such defendant does not waive any objections to the admissibility of any document preadmitted at such unrelated exhibit conference.

(s) February 5, 2001 – Discovery deadline;

(t) February 16, 2001 – All pretrial motions, dispositive motions and motions in limine must be filed;

(u) March 16, 2001 – All written responses to pretrial, dispositive motions, and motions in limine must be filed;

(v) April 6, 2001 at 1:00 – Hearing on all pretrial motions, dispositive motions, and motions in limine;

(w) May 14 -17, 2001 – Pretrial, settlement, and document conferences;

(x) June 4, 2001 – Jury selection and trial. By agreeing to specific dates included with the final scheduling order entered by the Court, no defendant waives any objection it may have to these proceedings. The objections and exceptions of all parties are noted, incorporated by reference, submitted for reconsideration, and preserved.

6. Discovery relevant to Phase II issues shall begin, if necessary, after consolidated trial of the common issues.

7. Should any plaintiff-specific discovery become necessary prior to the Phase I consolidated trial in order to preserve the testimony of a plaintiff reasonable and necessary discovery should be commenced immediately following these provisions which shall be established and observed.

(a) Once a specific plaintiff is designated as needing to have his or her testimony preserved, plaintiffs' counsel shall have five (5) days to turn over copies of all medical records concerning that plaintiff in their possession along with an executed authorization and answers to the defendants first set of interrogatories.

(b) The deposition of the designated plaintiff can be noticed anytime after ten (10) business days from the turning over of the indicated materials;

(c) The deposition of the designated plaintiff shall be limited to four (4) hours or whatever time period the plaintiff's treating physician feels that plaintiff can bear, including a reasonable period of time for breaks and meals.
