Argument

The established split in the circuits on the question presented here has now expanded to include the Ninth Circuit. On February 22, 2010, the Ninth Circuit decided the issue of whether “actual damages” under the Privacy Act encompasses both pecuniary and non-pecuniary damages. Cooper v. Fed. Aviation Admin., No. 08-17074, slip op. 2815 (9th Cir. Feb. 22, 2010). The Ninth Circuit held that it does:

Having reviewed the text, purpose, and structure of the Act, as well as how actual damages has been construed in other closely analogous statutes, we hold that Congress intended the term actual damages in the Act to encompass both pecuniary and nonpecuniary injuries.

Cooper, slip op. at 2835 (emphasis in original).

The Ninth Circuit’s decision puts the Eleventh Circuit squarely on the minority side of the circuit split. Pet. 11-14. And it further negates Respondents’ already spurious argument that the circuit split is a “narrow” one. Br. in Opp. 14. Even by Respondents’ count, there are now four circuits that have weighed in on the issue presented. Br. in Opp. 12 (conceding split among Eleventh, Fifth, and Sixth Circuits).¹ There are now six circuits by Petitioners' count. Pet. 12 (explaining Fourth and Tenth Circuit precedent).

The fact that the United States may at some point seek certiorari in Cooper is no reason to deny review here. As the United States noted in its letter to the Clerk of February 23, 2010, the United States has not even "determined whether it will seek rehearing en banc in [Cooper]." Thus, it is entirely speculative as to whether Cooper will ever be presented to this Court for review.

In any case, the present case would constitute a superior vehicle for this Court's review. In its decision, the Ninth Circuit noted that the government disputed the "evidence regarding [Cooper's] nonpecuniary injuries" and held that, "on remand, the district court has discretion to entertain motions from the parties regarding whether Cooper has proffered sufficient evidence of his nonpecuniary injuries to prove actual damages under the Act." Cooper, slip op. at 2838 n.4. Thus, Cooper arises in a genuinely interlocutory posture, because there are unresolved factual issues that may bear on the availability of damages for nonpecuniary injuries. In this case, by contrast, the Veterans' nonpecuniary injuries are undisputed. Pet. 13-14; Br. in Reply 1 n.2.

Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, and those stated in the Veterans' petition for writ of certiorari and reply brief, the petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted.²

Respectfully submitted,

Attorneys for Petitioners

² If the Court has some question as to whether this case or Cooper is a more appropriate vehicle for review, the Veterans respectfully suggest that one alternative is for the Court to hold their petition for writ of certiorari in abeyance, pending the United States' decision to seek certiorari in Cooper or not.
